Hence, in Christian iconography, the tau cross, or cross of the Old Testament, is called the anticipatory cross, because it anticipated the four-limbed cross of the passion, and the typical cross because it was its type. It is also called the cross of St. Anthony, because on it that saint is supposed to have suffered martyrdom.

Maurice, in his Indian Antiquities, refers to it the tiluk, or mark worn by the devotees of Brahma.

Davies, in his Celtic Researches, says that the "Gallicum tau," or the tau of the ancient Gauls, was among the Druids a symbol of their supreme god, or Jupiter.

Among the Egyptians, the tau, with an oval ring or handle, became the cruz ansata, and was used by them as the constant symbol of life. Dr. Clarke says (Travels, v. 311,) that the tau cross was a monogram of Thoth, "the symbolical or mystical name of hidden wisdom among the ancient Egyptians."

Dupuy, in his History of the Templars, says that the tau was a Templar emblem. Von Hammer, who lets no opportunity of maligning the Order escape him, adduces this as a proof of the idolatrous tendencies of the Knights. He explains the tau, which, he says, was inscribed on the forehead of the Baphomet or Templar idol, as a figure of the phallus; whence he comes to the conclusion that the Knights Templars were addicted to the obscene worship of that symbol. It is, however, entirely doubtful, notwithstanding the authority of Dupuy, whether the tau was a symbol of the Templars. But if it was, its origin is rather to be looked for in the supposed Hebrew idea as a symbol of preservation.

It is in this sense, as a symbol of salvation from death and of eternal life, that it has been adopted into the Masonic system, and presents itself, especially under its triple combination, as a badge of Royal Arch Masonry. See Triple Tau.

Tau Cross. A cross of three limbs, so called because it presents the figure of the Greek letter T. See Tau.

Team. Royal Arch Masons apply this word rather inelegantly to designate the three candidates upon whom the degree is conferred at the same time. The phrase is, I think, exclusively confined to this country.

Tears. In the Master's degree in some of the continental Rites, and in all the high degrees where the legend of the degree and the ceremony of reception are intended to express grief, the hangings of the Lodge are black strewn with tears. The figures representing tears are in the form depicted in the annexed cut. The symbolism is borrowed from the science of heraldry, where these figures are called gutes, and are defined to be "drops of anything that is by nature liquid or liquefied by art." The heralds have six of these charges, viz., yellow, or drops of liquid gold; white, or drops of liquid silver; red, or drops of blood; blue, or drops of tears; black, or drops of pitch; and green, or drops of oil. In funeral hatchments, a black velvet cloth, sprinkled with these "drops of tears," is placed in front of the house of a deceased nobleman and thrown over his bier; but there, as in Masonry, the guttae de larmes, or drops of tears, are not painted blue, but white.

Tempelorden or Tempelherrenorden. The title in German of the Order of Knights Templars.

Temperance. One of the four cardinal virtues, the practice of which is inculcated in the first degree. The Mason who properly appreciates the secrets which he has solemnly promised never to reveal, will not, by yielding to the unrestrained call of appetite, permit reason and judgment to lose their seats, and subject himself, by the indulgence in habits of excess, to discover that which should be concealed, and thus merit and receive the scorn and detestation of his brethren. And lest any brother should forget the danger to which he is exposed in the unguarded hours of dissipation, the virtue of temperance is wisely impressed upon his memory, by its reference to one of the most solemn portions of the ceremony of initiation. Some Masons, very properly condemning the vice of intemperance and abhorring its effects, have been unwisely led to confound temperance with total abstinence in a Masonic application, and resolutions have sometimes been proposed in Grand Lodges which declare the use of stimulating liquors in any quantity a Masonic offence. But the law of Masonry authorizes no such regulation. It leaves to every man the indulgence of his own tastes within due limits, and demands not abstinence, but only moderation and temperance, in anything not actually wrong.

Templar. See Knight Templar.

Templarius. The Latin title of a Knight Templar. Constantly used in the Middle Ages.

Templar Land. The Order of Knights Templars was dissolved in England, by an act of Parliament, in the seventeenth year of the reign of Edward II., and their possessions transferred to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, or Knights Hospitallers. Subsequently, in the thirty-second year of the reign of Henry VIII., their possessions were transferred to the king. One of the privileges possessed by the English Templars was that their lands should be free of tithes; and these privileges still adhere to these lands, so that a farm being what is termed "Templar land," is still exempt from the imposition of tithes, if it is occupied by the owner; an exemption which ceases when the farm is worked under a lease.

Templar Origin of Masonry. The theory that Masonry originated in the Holy Land during the Crusades, and was instituted by the Knights Templars, was first advanced by the Chevalier Ramsay, for the purpose, it is supposed, of giving an aristocratic character to the association. It was subsequently adopted by the College of Clermont, and was accepted by the Baron von Hund as the basis upon which he erected his Rite of Strict Observance. The legend of the Clermont College is thus detailed by M. Berage in his work entitled Les Plus Secrets Mystères des Hauts Grades, (iii. 194.) "The Order of Masonry was instituted, by Godfrey de Bouillon, in Palestine in 1330, after the defeat of the Christian armies, and was communicated only to a few of the French Masons, sometime afterwards, as a reward for the services which they had rendered to the English and Scottish Knights. From these latter true Masonry is derived. Their Mother Lodge is situated on the mountain of Heredom, where the first Lodge in Europe was held, which still exists in all its splendor. The Council General is always held there, and it is the seat of the Sovereign Grand Master for the time being. This mountain is situated between the west and the north of Scotland, sixty miles from Edinburgh.

"There are other secrets in Masonry which were never known among the French, and which have no relation to the Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master — degrees which were constructed for the general class of Masons. The high degrees, which developed the true design of Masonry and its true secrets, have never been known to them.

"The Saracens having obtained possession of the holy places in Palestine, where all the mysteries of the Order were practised, made use of them for the most profane purposes. The Christians then leagued together to conquer this beautiful country, and to drive these barbarians from the land. They succeeded in obtaining a footing on these shores under the protection of the numerous armies of Crusaders which had been sent there by the Christian princes. The losses which they subsequently experienced put an end to the Christian power, and the Crusaders who remained were subjected to the persecutions of the Saracens, who massacred all who publicly proclaimed the Christian faith. This induced Godfrey de Bouillon, towards the end of the third century, to conceal the mysteries of religion under the veil of figures, emblems, and allegories.

"Hence the Christians selected the Temple of Solomon because it has so close a relation to the Christian Church, of which its holiness and its magnificence make it the true symbol. So the Christians con-sealed the mystery of the building up of the Church under that of the construction of the Temple, and gave themselves the name of Masons, Architects or Builders, because they were occupied in building the faith. They assembled under the pretext of making plans of architecture to practise the rites of their religion, with all the emblems and allegories that Masonry could furnish, and thus protect themselves from the cruelty of the Saracens.

"As the mysteries of Masonry were in their principles, and still are only those of the Christian religion, they were extremely scrupulous to confide this important secret only to those whose discretion had been tried, and who had been found worthy. For this purpose they fabricated degrees as a test of those to whom they wished to confide it, and they gave them at first only the symbolic secret of Hiram, on which all the mystery of Blue Masonry is founded, and which is, in fact, the only secret of that Order which has no relation to true Masonry. They explained nothing else to them as they were afraid of being betrayed, and they conferred these degrees as a proper means of recognizing each other, surrounded as they were by barbarians. To succeed more effectually in this, they made use of different signs and words for each degree, so as not only to distinguish themselves from the profane Saracens, but to designate the different degrees. These they fixed at the number of seven, in imitation of the Grand Architect, who built the Universe in six days and rested on the seventh; and also because Solomon was seven years in constructing the Temple, which they had selected as the figurative basis of Masonry. Under the name of Hiram they gave a false application to the Masters, and developed the true secret of Masonry only to the higher degrees."

Such is the theory of the Templar origin of Masonry, which, mythical as it is, and wholly unsupported by the authority of history, has exercised a vast influence in the fabrication of high degrees and the invention of continental Rites. Indeed, of all the systems propounded during the eighteenth century, so fertile in the construction of extravagant systems, none has played so important a part as this in the history of Masonry. Although the theory is no longer maintained, its effects are everywhere seen and felt.

Templars of England. An important change in the organization of Templarism in England and Ireland took place in 1873. By it a union took place of the Grand Conclave of Masonic Knights Templars of England and the Grand Conclave of High Knights Templars of Ireland into one body, under the title of the "Convent General of the United Religious and Military Orders of the Temple and of St. John of Jerusalem, Palestine, Rhodes, and Malta." The following is a summary of the statutes by which the new Order is to be governed, as given by Sir Knight W. J. B. McLeod Moore, Grand Prior, in his circular to the Preceptors of Canada.

"1. The existing Grand Masters in the Empire are to be termed Great Priors, and Grand Conclaves or Encampments, Great Priories, under and subordinate to one Grand Master, as in the early days of the Order, and one Supreme Governing Body, the Convent General.

"2. The term Great is adopted instead of Grand, the latter being a French word; and grand in English is not grand in French. Great is the proper translation of 'Magnus' and 'Magnus Supremus.'

"3. The Great Priories of each nationality—England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their dependencies in the Colonies—retain their internal government and legislation, and appoint their Provincial Priors, doing nothing inconsistent with the supreme statutes of the Convent General.

"4. The title Masonic is not continued; the Order being purely Christian, none but Christians can be admitted; consequently it cannot be considered strictly as a Masonic body: Masonry, while inculcating the highest reverence for the Supreme Being, and the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, does not teach a belief in one particular creed, or unbelief in any. The connection with Masonry is, however, strengthened still more, as a candidate must now be two years a Master Mason, in addition to his qualification as a Royal Arch Mason.

"5. The titles Eminent 'Commander' and 'Encampment' have been discontinued, and the original name 'Preceptor' and 'Preceptory' substituted, as also the titles 'Constable' and 'Marshal' for 'First' and 'Second Captains.' 'Encampment' is a modern term, adopted probably when, as our traditions inform us, 'at the suppression of the ancient Military Order of the Temple, some of their number sought refuge and held conclaves in the Masonic Society, being independent small bodies, without any governing head.' 'Prior' is the correct and original title for the head of a langue or nationality, and 'Preceptor' for the subordinate bodies. The Preceptories were the ancient 'Houses' of the Templar Order; 'Commander' and 'Commanderies' was the title used by the Order of St. John, commonly known as Knights of Malta.

"6. The title by which the Order is now known is that of 'The United Religious and Military Orders of the Temple and of St. John of Jerusalem, Palestine, Rhodes, and Malta.' The Order of the Temple originally had no connection with that of Malta or Order of St. John; but the combined title appears to have been adopted in commemoration of the union which took place in Scotland with 'The Temple and Hospital of St. John,' when their lands were in common, at the time of the Reformation. But our Order of 'St. John of Jerusalem, Palestine, Rhodes, and Malta,' has no connection with the present Knights of Malta in the Papal States, or of the Protestant branches of the Order, the lineal successors of the ancient Knights of St. John, the sixth or English langue of which is still in existence, and presided over, in London, by His Grace the Duke of Manchester. The Order, when it occupied the Island of Malta as a sovereign body, was totally unconnected with Freemasonry.

"7. Honorary past rank is abolished, substituting the chivalric dignities of 'Grand Crosses' and 'Commanders,' limited in number, and confined to Preceptors. These honors to be conferred by His Royal Highness the Grand Master, the Fountain of Grace and Dignity; and it is contemplated to create an Order of Merit, to be conferred in like manner, as a reward to Knights who have served the Order.

"8. A Preceptor holds a degree as well as rank, and will always retain his rank and privileges as long as he belongs to a Preceptory.

"9. The abolition of honorary past rank is not retrospective, as their rank and privileges are reserved to all those who now enjoy them.

"10. The number of officers entitled to precedence has been reduced to seven; but others may be appointed at discretion, who do not, however, enjoy any precedence.

"11. Equerries, or serving brethren, are not to receive the accolade, or use any but a brown habit, and shall not wear any insignia or jewel: they are to be addressed as 'Frater,' not Sir Knight. In the early days of the Order they were not entitled to the accolade, and, with the esquires and men-at-arms, wore a dark habit, to distinguish them from the Knights, who wore white, to signify that they were bound by their vows to cast away the works of darkness and lead a new life.

"12. The apron is altogether discontinued, and a few immaterial alterations in the insignia will be duly regulated and promulgated: they do not, however, affect the present, but only apply to future, members of the Order. The apron was of recent introduction, to accord with Masonic usage:

but reflection will at once show that, as an emblem of care and toil, it is entirely inappropriate to a Military Order, whose badge is the sword. A proposition to confine the wearing of the star to the Preceptors was negative; the star and ribbon being in fact as much a part of the ritual as of the insignia of the Order.

"13. From the number of instances of persons totally unfitted having obtained admission into the Order, the qualification of candidates has been increased. A declaration is now required, to be signed by every candidate, that he is of the full age of twenty-one years, and in addition to being a Royal Arch Mason, that he is a Master Mason of two years' standing, professing the doctrines of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, and willing to submit to the statutes and ordinances, present and future, of the Order."

Templars of Scotland. The Statutes of the Grand Priory of the Temple of Scotland prescribe for the Order of Knights Templars in that kingdom an organization very different from that which prevails in other countries.

"The Religious and Military Order of the Temple" in Scotland consists of two classes: 1. Novice and Esquire; 2. Knight Templar. The Knights are again divided into four classes: 1. Knights created by Priors; 2. Knights elected from the companions on memorial to the Grand Master and Council, supported by the recommendation of the Priors to which they belong; 3. Knights Commanders; 4. Knights Grand Crosses, to be nominated by the Grand Master.

The supreme legislative authority of the Order is the Chapter General, which consists of the Grand Officers, the Knights Grand Crosses, and the Knights Commanders. One Chapter is held annually, at which the Grand Master, if present, acts as President. The anniversary of the death of James de Molay, March 11, is selected as the time of this meeting, at which the Grand Officers are elected.

During the intervals of the meetings of the Chapter General, the affairs of the Order, with the exception of altering the Statutes, is intrusted to the Grand Master's Council, which consists of the Grand Officers, the Grand Priors of Foreign Langues, and the Knights Grand Crosses.

The Grand Officers, with the exception of the Past Grand Masters, who remain so for life, the Grand Master, who is elected triennially, and the Grand Aides-de-Camp, who are appointed by him and removed at his pleasure, are elected annually. They are as follows:

Grand Master,

Past Grand Masters,
Grand Seneschal,
Preceptor and Grand Prior of Scotland,
Grand Constable and Mareschal,
Grand Admiral,
Grand Almoner or Hospitaller,
Grand Chancellor,
Grand Treasurer,
Grand Registrar,
Primate or Grand Prelate,
Grand Provost or Governor-General,
Grand Standard-Bearer or Beaucennifer,
Grand Bearer of the Vexillum Belli, Grand Chamberlain,
Grand Steward,
Two Grand Aides-de-Camp.

A Grand Priory may be instituted by the Chapter General in any nation, colony, or langue, to be placed under the authority of a Grand Prior, who is elected for life, unless superseded by the Chapter General.

A Priory, which is equivalent to our Commanderies, consists of the following officers:

Prior,
Sub-Prior,
Mareschal or Master of Ceremonies,
Hospitaller or Almoner,
Chancellor,
Treasurer,
Secretary,
Chaplain and Instructor,
Beaucennifer, or Bearer of the Beau-

seant,
Bearer of the Red Cross Banner, or Vexillum Belli, Chamberlain,
Two Aides-de-Camp.

The Chapter General or Grand Priory may unite two or more Pories into a Commandery, to be governed by a Provincial Commander, who is elected by the Chapter General.

The costume of the Knights, with the exception of a few slight variations to designate difference of rank, is the same as the ancient costume.

Temple. The symbolism of Speculative Masonry is so intimately connected with temple building and temple worship, that some notice of these edifices seems necessary. The Hebrews called a temple beth, which literally signifies a house or dwelling, and finds its root in a word which signifies "to remain or pass the night," or hecal, which means a palace, and comes from an obsolete word signifying "magnificent." So that they seem to have had two ideas in reference to a temple. When they called it beth Jehovah, or the "house of Jehovah," they referred to the continued presence of God in it; and when they called it hecal Jehovah, or the "palace of Jehovah," they referred to the splendor of the edifice which was selected as his residence. The Hebrew idea was undoubtedly borrowed from the Egyptian, where the same hieroglyphic  I signified both a house and a temple. Thus, from an inscription at Philæ, Champollion (Dict. Egyptienne) cites the sentence, "He has made his devotions in the house of his mother Isis."

The classical idea was more abstract and philosophical. The Latin word templum comes from a root which signifies "to cut off," thus referring to any space, whether open or occupied by a building, which was cut off, or separated for a sacred purpose, from the surrounding profane ground. The word properly denoted a sacred enclosure where the omens were observed by the augurs. Hence Varro (De Ling. Lat., vi. 81.) defines a temple to be "a place for auguries and auspices." As the same practice of worshipping under the sky in open places prevailed among the northern nations, we might deduce from these facts that the temple of the sky was the Aryan idea, and the temple of the house the Semitic. It is true, that afterwards, the augurs having for their own convenience erected a tent within the enclosure where they made their observations, or, literally, their contemplations, this in time gave rise among the Greeks and the Romans to permanent edifices like those of the Egyptians and the Hebrews.

Masonry has derived its temple symbolism, as it has almost all its symbolic ideas, from the Hebrew type, and thus makes the temple the symbol of a Lodge. But of the Roman temple worship it has not been neglectful, and has borrowed from it one of the most significant and important words in its vocabulary. The Latin word specular means to observe, to look around. When the augur, standing within the sacred precincts of his open temple on the Capitoline hill, watched the flight of birds, that from it he might deduce his auspices of good or bad fortune, he was said, speculari, to speculate. Hence the word came at length to denote, like contemplate from templum, an investigation of sacred things, and thus we got into our technical language the title of "Speculative Masonry," as distinguished by its religious design from Operative or Practical Masonry, which is devoted to more material objects. The EGYPTIAN TEMPLE was the real archetype of the Mosaic tabernacle, as that was of the temple of Jerusalem. The direction of an Egyptian temple was usually from east to west, the entrance being at the east. It was a quadrangular building, much longer than its width, and was situated in the western part of a sacred enclosure. The approach through this enclosure to the temple proper was frequently by a double row of sphinxes. In front of the entrance were a pair of tall obelisks, which will remind the reader of the two pillars at the porch of the Solomon's Temple. The temple was divided into a spacious hall, the sanctuary where the great body of the worshippers assembled. Beyond it, in the western extremity, was the cell or sekos, equivalent to the Jewish Holy of Holies, into which the priests only entered; and in the remotest part, behind a curtain, appeared the image of the god seated on his shrine, or the sacred animal which represented him.

GRECIAN TEMPLES, like the Egyptian and the Hebrew, were placed within an enclosure, which was separated from the profane land around it, in early times, by ropes, but afterwards by a wall. The temple was usually quadrangular, although some were circular in form. It was divided into two parts, the pronaos, porch or vestibule, and the naos, or cell. In this latter part the statue of the god was placed, surrounded by a balustrade. In temples connected with the mysteries, the cell was called the adytum, and to it only the priests and the initiates had access; and we learn from Pausanias that various stories were related of calamities that had befallen persons who had unlawfully ventured to cross the threshold. Vitruvius says that the entrance of Greek temples was always towards the west; but this statement is contradicted by the appearance of the temples still partly existing in Attica, Ionia, and Sicily.

ROMAN TEMPLES, after they emerged from their primitive simplicity, were constructed much upon the model of the Grecian. There were the same vestibule and cells, or adytum, borrowed, as with the Greeks, from the holy and the most holy place of the Egyptians. Vitruvius says that the entrance of a Roman temple was, if possible, to the west, so that the worshippers, when they offered prayers or sacrifices, might look towards the east; but this rule was not always observed.

It thus appears, notwithstanding what Montfaucon (Antiq. ii., l. ii., ch. 2,) says to the contrary, that the Egyptian form of a temple was the type from which other nations borrowed their idea.

This Egyptian form of a temple was borrowed by the Jews, and with some modifications adopted by the Greeks and Romans, whence it passed over into modern Europe. The idea of a separation into a holy and a most holy place has everywhere been preserved. The same idea is maintained in the construction of Masonic Lodges, which are but imitations, in spirit, of the ancient temples. But there has been a transposition of parts, the most holy place, which with the Egyptians and the Jews was in the west, being placed in Lodges in the east.

Temple, Grand Commander of the. (Grand Commandeur du Temple.) The fifty-eighth degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France. It is the name of the Knight Commander of the Temple of the Scottish Rite.

Temple of Ezekiel. An ideal temple seen by the prophet Ezekiel, in the twenty-fifth year of the captivity, while residing in Babylon. It is supposed by Calmet, that the description given by the prophet was that of the Temple of Solomon, which he must have seen before its destruction. But an examination of its admeasurements will show that this could not have been the fact, and that the whole area of Jerusalem would not have been sufficient to contain a building of its magnitude. Yet, as Mr. Ferguson observes, (Smith Dict.) the description, notwithstanding its ideal character, is curious, as showing what were the aspirations of the Jews in that direction, and how different they were from those of other nations; and also because it influenced Herod to some extent in his restoration of the temple of Zerubbabel. Between the visionary temple of Ezekiel and the symbolic city of the New Jerusalem, as described by the Evangelist, there is a striking resemblance, and hence it finds a place among the symbols in the Apocalyptic degrees. But with Symbolic or with Royal Arch Masonry it has no connection.

Temple of Herod. This was not the construction of a third temple, but only a restoration and extensive enlargement of the second, which had been built by Zerubbabel. To the Christian Mason it is interesting, even more than that of Solomon, because it was the scene of our Lord's ministrations, and was the temple from which the Knights Templars derived their name. It was begun by Herod seven years B. C., finished A. D. 4, and destroyed by the Romans in A. D. 70, having subsisted only seventy-seven years.

Temple of Solomon. The first Temple of the Jews was called hecal Jehovah or beth Jehovah, the palace or the house of Jehovah, to indicate its splendor and magnificence, and that it was intended to be the perpetual dwelling-place of the Lord. It was King David who first proposed to substitute for the nomadic tabernacle a permanent place of worship for his people; but although he had made the necessary arrangements, and even collected many of the materials, he was not permitted to commence the undertaking, and the execution of the task was left to his son and successor, Solomon.

Accordingly, that monarch laid the foundations of the edifice in the fourth year of his reign, 1012 B. C., and, with the assistance of his friend and ally, Hiram, king of Tyre, completed it in about seven years and a half, dedicating it to the service of the Most High in the year 1004 B. C. This was the year of the world 3000, according to the Hebrew chronology; and although there has been much difference among chronologists in relation to the precise date, this is the one that has been generally accepted, and it is therefore adopted by Masons in their calculations of different epochs.

The Temple stood on Mount Moriah, one of the eminences of the ridge which was known as Mount Zion, and which was originally the property of Ornan the Jebusite, who used it as a threshing-floor, and from whom it was purchased by David for the purpose of erecting an altar on it.

The Temple retained its original splendor for only thirty-three years. In the year of the world 3033, Shishak, king of Egypt, having made war upon Rehoboam, king of Judah, took Jerusalem, and carried away the choicest treasures. From that time to the period of its final destruction, the history of the Temple is but a history of alternate spoliations and repairs, of profanations to idolatry and subsequent restorations to the purity of worship. One hundred and thirteen years after the conquest of Shishak, Joash, king of Judah, collected silver for the repairs of the Temple, and restored it to its former condition in the year of the world 3148. In the year 3264, Ahaz, king of Judah, robbed the Temple of its riches, and gave them to Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, who had united with him in a war against the kings of Israel and Damascus. Ahaz also profaned the Temple by the worship of idols. In 3276, Hezekiah, the son and successor of Ahaz, repaired the portions of the Temple which his father had destroyed, and restored the pure worship. But fifteen years after he was compelled to give the treasures of the Temple as a ransom to Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who had invaded the land of Judah. But Hezekiah is supposed, after his enemy had retired, to have restored the Temple.

Manasseh, the son and successor of Hezekiah, fell away to the worship of Sabianism, and desecrated the Temple in 3306 by setting up altars to the host of heaven. Manasseh was then conquered by the king of Babylon, who in 3328 carried him beyond the Euphrates. But subsequently repenting of his sins he was released from captivity, and having returned to Jerusalem he destroyed the idols, and restored the altar of burnt-offerings. In 3380, Josiah, who was then king of Judah, devoted his efforts to the repairs of the Temple, portions of which had been demolished or neglected by his predecessors, and replaced the ark in the sanctuary. In 3398, in the reign of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Chaldea, carried a part of the sacred vessels to Babylon. Seven years afterwards, in the reign of Jechoniah, he took away another portion; and finally, in 3416, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, he took the city of Jerusalem, and entirely destroyed the Temple, and carried many of the inhabitants captives to Babylon.

The Temple was originally built on a very hard rock, encompassed with frightful precipices. The foundations were laid very deep, with immense labor and expense. It was surrounded with a wall of great height, exceeding in the lowest part four hundred and fifty feet, constructed entirely of white marble.

The body of the Temple was in size much less than many a modern parish church, for its length was but ninety feet, or, including the porch, one hundred and five, and its width but thirty. It was its outer court, its numerous terraces, and the magnificence of its external and internal decorations, together with its elevated position above the surrounding dwellings which produced that splendor of appearance that attracted the admiration of all who beheld it, and gives a color of probability to the legend that tells us how the Queen of Sheba, when it first broke upon her view, exclaimed in admiration, "A most excellent master must have done this!"

The Temple itself, which consisted of the porch, the sanctuary, and the Holy of Holies, was but a small part of the edifice on Mount Moriah. It was surrounded with spacious courts, and the whole structure occupied at least half a mile in circumference. Upon passing through the outer wall, you came to the first court, called the court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were admitted into it, but were prohibited from passing farther. It was surrounded by a range of porticos or cloisters, above which were galleries or apartments, supported by pillars of white marble.

Passing through the court of the Gentiles, you entered the court of the children of Israel, which was separated by a low stone wall, and an ascent of fifteen steps, into two divisions, the outer one being occupied by the women, and the inner by the men. Here the Jews were in the habit of resorting daily for the purposes of prayer.

Within the court of the Israelites, and separated from it by a wall one cubit in height, was the court of the priests. In the centre of this court was the altar of burnt-offerings, to which the people brought their oblations and sacrifices, but none but the priests were permitted to enter it.

From this court, twelve steps ascended to the Temple, strictly so called, which, as I have already said, was divided into three parts, the porch, the sanctuary, and the Holy of Holies.

The PORCH of the Temple was twenty cubits in length, and the same in breadth. At its entrance was a gate made entirely of Corinthian brass, the most precious metal known to the ancients. Beside this gate there were the two pillars Jachin and Boaz, which had been constructed by Hiram Abif, the architect whom the King of Tyre had sent to Solomon.

From the porch you entered the SANCTUARY by a portal, which, instead of folding-doors, was furnished with a magnificent veil of many colors, which mystically represented the universe. The breadth of the sanctuary was twenty cubits, and its length forty, or just twice that of the porch and Holy of Holies. It occupied, therefore, one-half of the body of the Temple. In the sanctuary were placed the various utensils necessary for the daily worship of the Temple, such as the altar of incense, on which incense was daily burnt by the officiating priest; the ten golden candlesticks; and the ten tables on which the offerings were laid previous to the sacrifice.

THE HOLY OF HOLIES, or innermost chamber, was separated from the sanctuary by doors of olive, richly sculptured and inlaid with gold, and covered with veils of blue, purple, scarlet, and the finest linen. The size of the Holy of Holies was the same as that of the porch, namely, twenty cubits square. It contained the ark of the covenant, which had been transferred into it from the tabernacle, with its overshadowing cherubim and its mercy-seat. Into the most sacred place, the high priest alone could enter, and that only once a year, on the day of atonement.

The Temple, thus constructed, must have been one of the most magnificent structures of the ancient world. For its erection, David had collected more than four thousand millions of dollars, and one hundred and eighty-four thousand six hundred men were engaged in building it for more than seven years; and after its completion it was dedicated by Solomon with solemn prayer and seven days of feasting; during which a peace-offering of twenty thousand oxen and six times that number of sheep was made, to consume which the holy fire came down from heaven.

In Masonry, the Temple of Solomon has played a most important part. Time was when every Masonic writer subscribed with unhesitating faith to the theory that Masonry was there first organized; that there Solomon, Hiram of Tyre, and Hiram Abif presided as Grand Masters over the Lodges which they had established; that there the symbolic degrees were instituted and systems of initiation were invented; and that from that period to the present Masonry has passed down the stream of Time in unbroken succession and unaltered form. But the modern method of reading Masonic history has swept away this edifice of imagination with as unsparing a hand, and as effectual a power, as those with which the Babylonian king demolished the structure upon which they are founded. No writer who values his reputation as a critical historian would now attempt to defend this theory. Yet it has done its work. During the long period in which the hypothesis was accepted as a fact, its influence was being exerted in moulding the Masonic organizations into a form closely connected with all the events and characteristics of the Solomonic Temple. So that now almost all the symbolism of Freemasonry rests upon or is derived from the "House of the Lord" at Jerusalem. So closely are the two connected, that to attempt to separate the one from the other would be fatal to the further existence of Masonry. Each Lodge is and must be a symbol of the Jewish Temple; each Master in the chair a representative of the Jewish king; and every Mason a personation of the Jewish workman.

Thus must it ever be while Masonry endures. We must receive the myths and legends that connect it with the Temple, not indeed as historic facts, but as allegories; not as events that have really transpired, but as symbols; and must accept these allegories and these symbols for what their inventors really meant that they should be—the foundations of a science of morality.

Temple of Zerubbabel. For the fifty-two years that succeeded the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, that city saw nothing but the ruins of its ancient Temple. But in the year of the world 3468 and 536 B. C., Cyrus gave permission to the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and there to rebuild the Temple of the Lord.

Forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty of the liberated captives returned under the guidance of Joshua, the High Priest, Zerubbabel, the Prince or Governor, and Haggai, the Scribe, and one year after they laid the foundations of the second Temple. They were, however, much disturbed in their labours by the Samaritans, whose offer to unite with them in the building they had rejected. Artaxerxes, known in profane history as Cambyses, having succeeded Cyrus on the throne of Persia, he forbade the Jews to proceed with the work, and the Temple remained in an unfinished state until the death of Artaxerxes and the succession of Darius to the throne. As in early life there had been a great intimacy between this sovereign and Zerubbabel, the latter proceeded to Babylon, and obtained permission from the monarch to resume the labor. Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem, and notwithstanding some further delays, consequent upon the enmity of the neighboring nations, the second Temple, or, as it may be called by way of distinction from the first, the Temple of Zerubbabel, was completed in the sixth year of the reign of Darius, 515 years B. C., and just twenty years after its commencement. It was then dedicated with all the solemnities that accompanied the dedication of the first.

The general plan of this second Temple was similar to that of the first. But it exceeded it in almost every dimension by one-third. The decorations of gold and other ornaments in the first Temple must have far surpassed those bestowed upon the second, for we are told by Josephus, (Antiq., xi. 4), that "the Priests and Levites and Elders of families were disconsolate at seeing how much more sumptuous the old Temple was than the one which, on account of their poverty, they had just been able to erect."

The Jews also say that there were five things wanting in the second Temple which had been in the first, namely, the Ark, the Urim and Thummim, the fire from heaven, the divine presence or cloud of glory, and the spirit of prophecy and power of miracles.

Such are the most important events that relate to the construction of this second Temple. But there is a Masonic legend connected with it which, though it may have no historical foundation, is yet so closely interwoven with the Temple system of Masonry, that it is necessary it should be recounted. It was, says the legend, while the workmen were engaged in making the necessary excavations for laying the foundation, and while numbers continued to arrive at Jerusalem from Babylon, that three worn and weary sojourners, after plodding on foot over the rough and devious roads between the two cities, offered themselves to the Grand Council as willing participants in the labor of erection. Who these sojourners were, we have no historical means of discovering; but there is a Masonic tradition (entitled, perhaps, to but little weight) that they were Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, three holy men, who are better known to general readers by their Chaldaic names of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, as having been miraculously preserved from the fiery furnace of Nebuchadnezzar.

Their services were accepted, and from their diligent labors resulted that important discovery, the perpetuation and preservation of which constitute the great end and design of the Royal Arch degree.

As the symbolism of the first or Solomon-ic Temple is connected with and refers entirely to the symbolic degrees, so that of the second, or Temple of Zerubbabel, forms the basis of the Royal Arch in the York and American Rites, and of several high degrees in other Rites.

Temple, Order of the. When the Knights Templars had, on account of their power and wealth, excited the fears and the cupidity of Pope Clement V., and King Philip the Fair, of France, the Order was soon compelled to succumb to the combined animosity of a spiritual and a temporal sovereign, neither of whom was capable of being controlled by a spirit of honor or a dictate of conscience. The melancholy story of the sufferings of the Knights, and of the dissolution of their Order, forms a disgraceful record, with which the history of the fourteenth century begins.

On the 13th of March, in the year 1314, and in the refined city of Paris, James de Molay, the last of a long and illustrious line of Grand Masters of the Order of Knights Templars, testified at the stake his fidelity to his vows; and eleven years of service in the cause of religion were terminated, not by the sword of a Saracen, but by the iniquitous sentence of a Catholic pope and a Christian king.

The manufacturers of Masonic legends have found in the death of Molay and the dissolution of the Order of Templars a fertile source from which to draw materials for their fanciful theories and surreptitious documents. Among these legends there was, for instance, one which maintained that during his captivity in the Bastille the Grand Master of the Templars established four Chiefs of the Order in the north, the south, the east, and the west of Europe, whose seats of government were respectively at Stockholm, Naples, Paris, and Edinburgh. Another invention of these Masonic speculators was the forgery of that document so well known as the Charter of Larmenius, of which I shall presently take notice. Previously, however, to any consideration of this document, I must advert to the condition of the Templar Order in Portugal, because there is an intimate connection between the society there organized and the ORDER OF THE TEMPLE in France, which is more particularly the subject of the present article.

Surprising as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that the Templars did not receive that check in Portugal to which they were subjected in France, in England, and some other countries of Europe. On the contrary, they were there maintained by King Denis in all their rights and privileges; and although compelled, by a bull of Clement V., to change their names to that of the Knights of Christ, they continued to be governed by the same rules and to wear the same costume as their predecessors, excepting the slight addition of placing a white Latin cross in the centre of the usual red one of the ancient Order; and in the decree of establishment it was expressly declared that the king, in creating this new Order, intended only to effect a reform in that of the Templars. In 1420, John I., of Portugal, gave the Knights of Christ the control of the possessions of Portugal in the Indies, and succeeding monarchs granted them the proprietorship of all countries which they might discover, reserving, of course, the royal prerogative of sovereignty. In process of time the wealth and the power of the Order became so great, that the kings of Portugal found it expedient to reduce their rights to a considerable extent; but the Order itself was permitted to continue in existence, the Grand Mastership, however, being for the future vested in the sovereign.

We are now prepared to investigate understandingly the history of the Charter of Larmenius, and of the Order of the Temple at Paris, which was founded on the assumed authenticity of that document. The writings of Thory, of Ragon, and of Clavel, with the passing remarks of a few other Masonic writers, will furnish us with abundant materials for this narrative, interesting to all Freemasons, but more especially so to Masonic Knights Templars.

In the year 1682, and in the reign of Louis XIV., a licentious society was established by several young noblemen, which took the name of "La Petite Resurrection des Templiers," or "The little Resurrection of the Templars." The members wore concealed upon their shirts a decoration in the form of a cross, on which was embossed the figure of a man trampling on a woman, who lay prostrate at his feet. The emblematic signification of this symbol was, it is apparent, as unworthy of the character of man as it was derogatory to the condition and claims of woman; and the king, having been informed of the infamous proceedings which took place at the meetings, dissolved the society, (which it was said was on the eve of initiating the dauphin;) caused its leader, a prince of the blood, to be ignominiously punished, and banished the members from the court; the heaviest penalty that, in those days of servile submission to the throne, could be inflicted on a courtier.

In 1705, Philip of Orleans, who was subsequently the regent of France during the minority of Louis XV., collected together the remnants of this society, which still secretly existed, but had changed its object from a licentious to one of a political character. He caused new statutes to be constructed; and an Italian Jesuit, by name Father Bonani, who was a learned antiquary and an excellent designer, fabricated the document now known as the Charter of Larmenius, and thus pretended to attach the new society to the ancient Order of the Templars.

As this charter is not the least interesting of those forged documents with which the history of Freemasonry unfortunately abounds, a full description of it here will not be out of place.

The theory of the Duke of Orleans and his accomplice Bonani was, (and the theory is still maintained by the Order of the Temple at Paris,) that when James de Molay was about to suffer at the stake, he sent for Larmenius, and in prison, with the consent and approbation of such of his knights as were present, appointed him his successor, with the right of making a similar appointment before his death. On the demise of Molay, Larmenius accordingly assumed the office of Grand Master, and ten years after issued this charter, transmitting his authority to Theobaldus Alexandrinus, by whom it was in like manner transmitted through a long line of Grand Masters, until in 1705 it reached Philip, Duke of Orleans. It will be seen hereafter that the list was subsequently continued to a later period.

The signatures of all these Grand Masters are affixed to the charter, which is beautifully executed on parchment, illuminated in the choicest style of mediæval chirography, and composed in the Latin language, but written in the Templar cipher. From the copy of the document given by Thory in his Acta Latomorum, I make the following translation:

"I, Brother John Mark Larmenius, of Jerusalem, by the grace of God and the secret decree of the most venerable and holy martyr, the Grand Master of the Soldiery of the Temple, (to whom be honor and glory,) confirmed by the common council of the brethren, being endowed with the Supreme Grand Mastership of the whole Order of the Temple, to every one who shall see these letters decretal thrice greeting:

"Be it known to all, both present and to come, that the failure of my strength, on account of extreme age, my poverty, and the weight of government being well considered, I, the aforesaid humble Master of the Soldiery of the Temple, have determined, for the greater glory of God and the protection and safety of the Order, the brethren, and the statutes, to resign the Grand Mastership into stronger hands.

"On which account, God helping, and with the consent of a Supreme Convention of Knights, I have conferred, and by this present decree do confer, for life, the authority and prerogatives of Grand Master of the Order of the Temple upon the Eminent Commander and very dear brother, Francis Thomas Theobald Alexandrinus, with the power, according to time and circumstances, of conferring the Grand Mastership of the Order of the Temple and the supreme authority upon another brother, most eminent for the nobility of his education and talent and decorum of his manners: which is done for the purpose of maintaining a perpetual succession of Grand Masters, an uninterrupted series of successors, and the integrity of the statutes. Nevertheless, I command that the Grand Mastership shall not be transmitted without the consent of a general convention of the fellow-soldiers of the Temple, as often as that Supreme Convention desires to be convened; and, matters being thus conducted, the successor shall be elected at the pleasure of the knights.

"But, lest the powers of the supreme office should fall into decay, now and for ever let there be four Vicars of the Grand Master, possessing supreme power, eminence, and authority over the whole Order, with the reservation of the rights of the Grand Master; which Vicars of the Grand Masters shall be chosen from among the elders, according to the order of their profession. Which is decreed in accordance with the above-mentioned wish, commended to me and to the brethren by our most venerable and most blessed Master, the martyr, to whom be honor and glory. Amen.

"Finally, in consequence of a decree of a Supreme Convention of the brethren, and by the supreme authority to me committed, I will, declare, and command that the Scottish Templars, as deserters from the Order, are to be accursed, and that they and the brethren of St. John of Jerusalem, (upon whom may God have mercy,) as spoliators of the domains of our soldiery, are now and hereafter to be considered as beyond the pale of the Temple.

"I have therefore established signs, unknown to our false brethren, and not to be known by them, to be orally communicated to our fellow-soldiers, and in which way I have already been pleased to communicate them in the Supreme Convention.

"But these signs are only to be made known after due profession and knightly consecration, according to the statutes, rites, and usages of the fellow-soldiery of the Temple, transmitted by me to the above-named Eminent Commander as they were delivered into my hands by the venerable and most holy martyr, our Grand Master, to whom be honor and glory. Let it be done as I have said. So mote it be. Amen.

"I, John Mark Larmenius, have done this on the thirteenth day of February, 1324.

"I, Francis Thomas Theobaldus Alexandrinus, God helping, have accepted the Grand Mastership, 1324."

And then follow the acceptances and signatures of twenty-two succeeding Grand Masters — the last, Bernard Raymund Fabré, under the date of 1804.

The society, thus organized by the Duke of Orleans in 1705, under this charter, which purported to contain the signatures manu propria of eighteen Grand Masters in regular succession, commencing with Larmenius and ending with himself, attempted to obtain a recognition by the Order of Christ, which we have already said was established in Portugal as the legitimate successor of the old Templars, and of which King John V. was at that time the Grand Master. For this purpose the Duke of Orleans ordered two of his members to proceed to Lisbon, and there to open negotiations with the Order of Christ. The king caused inquiries to be made of Don Luis de Cunha, his ambassador at Paris, upon whose report he gave orders for the arrest of the two French Templars. One of them escaped to Gibraltar; but the other, less fortunate, after an imprisonment of two years, was banished to Angola, in Africa, where he died.

The society, however, continued secretly to exist for many years in France, and is supposed by some to have been the same which, in 1789, was known by the name of the Société d'Aloyau, a title which might be translated into English as the "Society of the Sirloin," — a name much more appropriate to a club of bons vivants than to an association of knights. The members of this society were dispersed at the time of the French Revolution, the Duke of Casse Brissac, who was massacred at Versailles in 1792, being its Grand Master at the period of its dispersion. Thory says that the members of this association claimed to be the successors of the Templars, and to be in possession of their charters.

A certain Brother Ledru, one of the sons of the learned Nicholas Philip Ledru, was the physician of Casse Brissac. On the death of that nobleman and the sale of his property, Ledru purchased a piece of furniture, probably an escritoire, in which was concealed the celebrated charter of Larmenius, the manuscript statutes of 1705, and the journal of proceedings of the Order of the Temple. Clavel says that about the year 1804, Ledru showed these articles to two of his friends — de Saintot and Fabré Palaprat; the latter of whom had formerly been an ecclesiastic. The sight of these documents suggested to them the idea of reviving the Order of the Temple. They proposed to constitute Ledru the Grand Master, but he refused the offer, and nominated Claudius Matheus Radix de Chevillon for the office, who would accept it only under the title of Vicar; and he is inscribed as such on the list attached to the Charter of Larmenius, his name immediately following that of Casse Brissac, who is recorded as the last Grand Master.

These four restorers of the Order were of opinion that it would be most expedient to place it under the patronage of some distinguished personage; and while making the effort to carry this design into execution, Chevillon, excusing himself from further official labor on account of his advanced age, proposed that Fabré Palaprat should be elected Grand Master, but for one year only, and with the understanding that he would resign the dignity as soon as some notable person could be found who would be willing to accept it. But Fabré, having once been invested with the Grand Mastership, ever afterwards refused to surrender the dignity.

Among the persons who were soon after admitted into the Order were Decourchant, a notary's clerk; Leblond, an official of the imperial library; and Arnal, an ironmonger, all of whom were intrusted with the secret of the fraud, and at once engaged in the construction of what have since been designated the "Relics of the Order." Of these relics, which are preserved in the treasury of the Order of the Temple at Paris, an inventory was made on the 18th day of May, 1810, being, it is probable, soon after their construction. Dr. Burnes, who was a firm believer in the legitimacy of the Parisian Order and in the authenticity of its archives, has given in his Sketch of the History of the Knights Templars, (App., p. xii.,) a copy of this inventory in the original French. Thory gives it also in his Acta Latomorum, (ii. 143.) A brief synopsis of it may not be uninteresting. The relics consist of twelve pieces—"a round dozen"—and are as follows:

1. The Charter of Larmenius, already described. But to the eighteen signatures of Grand Masters in the charter, which was in 1705 in possession of Philip, Duke of Orleans, are added six more, carrying the succession on from the last-named to Fabré Palaprat, who attests as Grand Master in 1804.

2. A volume of twenty-seven paper sheets, in folio, bound in crimson velvet, satin, and gold, containing the statutes of the Order in manuscript, and signed "Philip."

3. A small copper reliquary, in the shape of a Gothic church, containing four fragments of burnt bones, wrapped in a piece of linen. These are said to have been taken from the funeral pile of the martyred Templars.

4. A sword, said to be one which belonged to James de Molay.

5. A helmet, supposed to have been that of Guy, Dauphin of Auvergne.

6. An old gilt spur.

7. A bronze patina, in the interior of which is engraved an extended hand, having the ring and little fingers bent in upon the palm, which is the form of the episcopal benediction in the Roman Church.

8. A pax in gilt bronze, containing a representation of St. John, under a Gothic arch. The pax is a small plate of gold, silver, or other rich material, carried round by the priest to communicate the "kiss of peace."

9. Three Gothic seals.

10. A tall ivory cross and three mitres, richly ornamented.

11. The beauseant, in white linen, with the cross of the Order.

12. The war standard, in white linen, with four black rays.

Of these "relics," Clavel, who, as being on the spot, may be supposed to know something of the truth, tells us that the copper reliquary, the sword, the ivory cross, and the three mitres were bought by Leblond from an old iron shop in the market of St. Jean, and from a maker of church vestments in the suburbs of Paris, while the helmet was taken by Arnal from one of the government armories.

Francisco Alvaro da Sylva Freyre de

Porto, a knight of the Order of Christ, and a secret agent of John VI., king of Portugal, was admitted into the Order in 1805, and continued a member until 1815. He was one of the few, Clavel says, whom Fabré and the other founders admitted into their full confidence, and in 1812 he held the office of Grand Master's Secretary. Fabré having signified to him his desire to be recognized as the successor of James de Molay by the Grand Master of the Order of Christ, Da Silva sent a copy of the Charter of Larmenius to John VI., who was then in Brazil; but the request for recognition was refused.

The Order of the Temple, which had thus been ingeniously organized by Fabré Palaprat and his colleagues, began now to assume high prerogatives as the only representative of ancient Templarism. The Grand Master was distinguished by the sounding titles of "Most Eminent Highness, Very Great, Powerful, and Excellent Prince, and Most Serene Lord." The whole world was divided into different jurisdictions, under the names of provinces, bailiwicks, priories, and commanderies, all of which were distributed among the members; and proofs of nobility were demanded of all candidates; but if they were not able to give these proofs, they were furnished by the Grand Master with the necessary patents.

The ceremonies of initiation were divided into three houses, again subdivided into eight degrees, and were as follows:

I. HOUSE OF INITIATION.

1. Initiate. This is the Entered Apprentice's degree of Freemasonry.
2. Initiate of the Interior. This is the Fellow Craft.
3. Adept. This is the Master Mason.
4. Adept of the East. The Elu of Fifteen of the Scottish Rite.
5. Grand Adept of the Black Eagle of St. John. The Elu of Nine of the Scottish Rite.

II. HOUSE OF POSTULANCE.

6. Postulant of the Order. The Rose Croix degree.

III. COUNCIL.

7. Esquire. Merely a preparation for the eighth degree.
8. Knight, or Levite of the Interior Guard. The Philosophical Kadosh

At first the members of the Order professed the Roman Catholic religion, and hence, on various occasions, Protestants and Jews were denied admission. But about the year 1814, the Grand Master having obtained possession of a manuscript copy of a spurious Gospel of St. John, which is supposed to have been forged in the fifteenth century, and which contradicted in many particulars the canonical Gospel, he caused it to be adopted as the doctrine of the Order; and thus, as Clavel says, at once transformed an Order which had always been perfectly orthodox into a schismatic sect. Out of this spurious Gospel and an introduction and commentary called the "Levitikon," said to have been written by Nicephorus, a Greek monk of Athens, Fabré and his colleagues composed a liturgy, and established a religious sect to which they gave the name of "Johannism."

The consequence of this change of religious views was a schism in the Order. The orthodox party, however, appears to have been the stronger; and after the others had for a short time exhibited themselves as soi-disant priests in a Johannite church which they erected, and in which they publicly chanted the liturgy which they had composed, the church and the liturgy were given up, and they retired once more into the secrecy of the Order.

Such is a brief history of the rise and progress of the celebrated Order of the Temple, which still exists at Paris, with, however, a much abridged exercise, if not with less assumption of prerogative. It still claims to be the only true depository of the powers and privileges of the ancient Order of Knights Templars, denouncing all other Templars as spurious, and its Grand Master proclaims himself the legal successor of James de Molay; with how much truth the narrative already given will enable every reader to decide.

The question of the legality of the "Order of the Temple," as the only true body of Knights Templars in modern days, is to be settled only after three other points have been determined: First, was the Charter of Larmenius, which was brought for the first time to light in 1705 by the Duke of Orleans, an authentic or a forged document? Next, even if authentic, was the story that Larmenius was invested with the Grand Mastership and the power of transmission by Molay a fact or a fable? And, lastly, was the power exercised by Ledru, in reorganizing the Order in 1804, assumed by himself or actually derived from Casse Brissac, the previous Grand Master? There are many other questions of subordinate but necessary importance to be examined and settled before we can consent to give the Order of the Temple the high and, as regards Templarism, the exclusive position that it claims.

Temple, Second. The Temple built by Zerubbabel is so called. See Temple of Zerubbabel.

Temple, Sovereign Commander of the. See Sovereign Commander of the Temple.

Temple, Sovereign of the Sovereigns Grand Commander of the. (Souverain des Souverains Grands Commandeur du Temple.) A degree in the collection of Lemanceau and Le Page. It is said to be a part of the Order of Christ or Portuguese Templarism.

Temple, Spiritual. See Spiritual Temple.

Temple, Symbolism of the. Of all the objects which constitute the Masonic science of symbolism, the most important, the most cherished by Masons, and by far the most significant, is the Temple of Jerusalem. The spiritualizing of the Temple is the first, the most prominent, and the most pervading of all symbols of Freemasonry. It is that which most emphatically gives it its religious character. Take from Freemasonry its dependence on the Temple; leave out of its ritual all reference to that sacred edifice, and to the legends and traditions connected with it, and the system itself would at once decay and die, or at best remain only as some fossilized bone, serving merely to show the nature of the once living body to which it had belonged.

Temple worship is in itself an ancient type of the religious sentiment in its progress towards spiritual elevation. As soon as a nation emerged out of Feticism, or the worship of visible objects, which is the most degraded form of idolatry, its people began to establish a priesthood, and to erect temples. The Goths, the Celts, the Egyptians, and the Greeks, however much they may have differed in the ritual, and in the objects of their polytheistic worship, were all in the possession of priests and of temples. The Jews, complying with this law of our religious nature, first constructed their tabernacle, or portable temple, and then, when time and opportunity permitted, transferred their monotheistic worship to that more permanent edifice which towered in all its magnificence above the pinnacle of Mount Moriah. The mosque of the Mohammedan and the church or chapel of the Christian is but an embodiment of the same idea of temple worship in a simpler form.

The adaptation, therefore, of the Temple of Jerusalem to a science of symbolism, would be an easy task to the mind of those Jews and Tyrians who were engaged in its construction. Doubtless, at its original conception, the idea of this temple symbolism was rude and unembellished. It was to be perfected and polished only by future aggregations of succeeding intellects. And yet no biblical nor Masonic scholar will venture to deny that there was, in the mode of building and in all the circumstances connected with the construction of King Solomon's Temple, an apparent design to establish a foundation for symbolism.

The Freemasons have, at all events, seized with avidity the idea of representing in their symbolic language the interior and spiritual man by a material temple. They have the doctrine of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, who has said, "Know ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you." The great body of the Masonic craft, looking only to this first Temple erected by the wisdom of King Solomon, make it the symbol of life; and as the great object of Masonry is the search after truth, they are directed to build up this temple as a fitting receptacle for truth when found, a place where it may dwell, just as the ancient Jews built up their great Temple as a dwelling-place for Him who is the author of all truth.

To the Master Mason, this Temple of Solomon is truly the symbol of human life; for, like life, it was to have its end. For four centuries it glittered on the hills of Jerusalem in all its gorgeous magnificence; now, under some pious descendant of the wise king of Israel, the spot from whose altars arose the burnt-offerings to a living God, and now polluted by some recreant monarch of Judah to the service of Baal; until at length it received the divine punishment through the mighty king of Babylon, and, having been despoiled of all its treasures, was burnt to the ground, so that nothing was left of all its splendor but a smouldering heap of ashes. Variable in its purposes, evanescent in its existence, now a gorgeous pile of architectural beauty, and anon a ruin over which the resistless power of fire has passed, it becomes a fit symbol of human life occupied in the search after divine truth, which is nowhere to be found; now sinning and now repentant; now vigorous with health and strength, and anon a senseless and decaying corpse.

Such is the symbolism of the first Temple, that of Solomon, as familiar to the class of Master Masons: But there is a second and higher class of the Fraternity, the Masons of the Royal Arch, by whom this temple symbolism is still further developed.

This second class, leaving their early symbolism and looking beyond this Temple of Solomon, find in scriptural history another Temple, which, years after the destruction of the first one, was erected upon its ruins; and they have selected the second Temple, the Temple of Zerubbabel, as their prominent symbol. And as the first class of Masons find in their Temple the symbol of mortal life, limited and perishable, they, on the contrary, see in this second Temple, built upon the foundations of the first, a symbol of life eternal, where the lost truth shall be found, where new incense shall arise from a new altar, and whose perpetuity their great Master had promised when, in the very spirit of symbolism, he exclaimed, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up."

And so to these two classes or Orders of Masons the symbolism of the Temple presents itself in a connected and continuous form. To the Master Mason, the Temple of Solomon is the symbol of this life; to the Royal Arch Mason, the Temple of Zerubbabel is the symbol of the future life. To the former, his Temple is the symbol of the search for truth; to the latter, his is the symbol of the discovery of truth; and thus the circle is completed and the system made perfect.

Temple, Workmen at the. See Workmen at the Temple.

Templier. The title of a Knight Templar in French. The expression "Chevalier Templier" is scarcely ever used by French writers.

Templum Hierosolymæ. Latin for the Temple of Jerusalem. It is supposed by some to be a phrase concealed under the monogram of the Triple Tau, which see.

Ten. Ten cannot be considered as a sacred number in Masonry. But by the Pythagoreans it was honored as a symbol of the perfection and consummation of all things. It was constituted of the monad and duad, the active and passive principles, the triad or their result, and the quaternior or first square, and hence they referred it to their sacred tetractys. They said that ten contained all the relations of numbers and harmony. See Tetractys.

Tengu. A significant word in the high degrees of the Scottish Rite. The original old French rituals explain it, and say that it and the two other words that accompany are formed out of the initials of the words of a particular sentence which has reference to the "Sacred treasure" of Masonry.

Tennessee. Until the end of the year 1813, the State of Tennessee constituted a part of the Masonic jurisdiction of North Carolina, and the Lodges were held under Warrants issuing from the Grand Lodge of "North Carolina and Tennessee," with the exception of one Lodge in Davidson County, which derived its Charter from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky. In December, 1811, a convention was held at Knoxville, when an address was directed to the Grand Lodge of North Carolina, soliciting its assent to the severance of the Masonic jurisdiction and the establishment of an independent Grand Lodge. In October, 1813, this consent was granted, and a convention of the Lodges was ordered by the Grand Master to assemble at Knoxville on December 27, 1813, that the Grand Lodge of Tennessee might be legally constituted. Delegates from eight Lodges accordingly assembled on that day at Knoxville, and a convention was duly organized. A deed of relinquishment from the Grand Lodge of North Carolina was read. By this instrument the Grand Lodge of North Carolina relinquished all authority and jurisdiction over the several Lodges in the State of Tennessee, and assented to the erection of an independent Grand Lodge. A Constitution was accordingly adopted and the Grand Lodge of Tennessee organized, Thomas Claiborne being elected Grand Master.

The first Royal Arch Chapters in Tennessee were instituted by the General Grand Chapter, and the Grand Chapter of Tennessee was organized in 1826.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was established October 13, 1847.

The Grand Commandery of Tennessee was organized October 12, 1859.

There are in the State a few bodies of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which derive their Charters from the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction.

Tent. The tent, which constitutes a part of the paraphernalia or furniture of a Commandery of Knights Templars, is not only intended for a practical use, but also has a symbolic meaning. The Order of the Templars was instituted for the protection of Christian pilgrims who were visiting the sepulchre of their Lord. The Hospitallers might remain in the city and fulfil their vows by attendance on the sick, but the Templar must away to the plains, the hills, and the desert, there, in his lonely tent, to watch the wily Saracen, and to await the toilsome pilgrim, to whom he might offer the crust of bread and the draught of water, and instruct him in his way, and warn him of danger, and give him words of good cheer. Often in the early history of the Order, before luxury and wealth and vice had impaired its purity, must these meetings of the toilsome pilgrim, on his way to the holy shrine, with the valiant Knight who stood by his tent door on the roadside, have occurred. And it is just such events as these that are commemorated in the tent scenes of the Templar ritual.

Tenure of Office. All offices in the bodies of the York and American Rites are held by annual election. But the holder of an office does not become functus officii by the election of his successor; he retains the office until that successor has been installed. This is technically called "holding over." It is not election only, but election and installation that give possession of an office in Masonry. If a new Master, having been elected, should, after the election and installation of the other officers of the Lodge, refuse to be installed, the old Master would "hold over," or retain the office until the next annual election. The oath of office of every officer is that he will perform the duties of the office for twelve months, and until his successor shall have been installed. In France, in the last century, Warrants of Constitution were granted to certain Masters who held the office for life, and were thence called "Maitres inamovibles," or immovable Masters. They considered the Lodges committed to their care as their personal property, and governed them despotically, according to their own caprices. But in 1772 this class of Masters had become so unpopular, that the Grand Lodge removed them, and made the tenure of office the same as it was in England.

In the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, the officers of a Supreme Council hold their offices, under the Constitutions of 1786, for life. In the subordinate bodies of the Rite, the elections are held triennially. This is also the rule in the Supreme Council of the Northern Jurisdiction, which has abandoned the law of perpetual tenure.

Tercy. One of the nine Elus recorded in the high degrees as having been sent out by Solomon to make the search which is referred to in the Master's legend. The name was invented by Ramsay, with some allusion, not now explicable, to the political incidents of Stuart Masons. The name is probably an anagram or corruption of some friend of the house of Stuart. See Anagram.

Terminus. The god of landmarks, whose worship was introduced among the Romans by Numa. The god was represented by a cubical stone. Of all the gods, Terminus was the only one who, when the new Capitol was building, refused to remove his altar. Hence Ovid (Fasti, ii. 673,) addressed him thus: "O Terminus, no inconstancy was permitted thee; in whatever situation thou hast been placed, there abide, and do not yield one jot to any neighbor asking thee." The Masons pay the same reverence to their landmarks that the Romans did to their god Terminus.

Terrasson, the Abbé Jean. The Abbé Terrasson was born at Lyons, in France, in 1670. He was educated by the congregation of the Oratory, of which his brother André was a priest, but eventually abandoned it, which gave so much offence to his father, that he left him by his will only a very moderate income. The Abbé obtained a chair in the Academy of Sciences in 1707, and a professorship in the Royal College in 1724, which position he occupied until his death in 1750. He was the author of a Critical Dissertation on the Iliad of Homer, a translation of Diodorus Seculus, and several other classical and philosophical works. But his work most interesting to the Masonic scholar is his Sethos, histoire ou vie tirée des monumens anecdotes de l'ancienne Egypte, published at Paris in 1731. This work excited on its appearance so much attention in the literary world, that it was translated into the German and English languages under the respective titles of: 1. Abris der wahren Helden-Tugend, oder Lebensgeschichte des Sethos; translated by Chro. Gli. Wendt, Hamburg, 1732. 2. Geschichte des Königs Sethos; translated by Matth. Claudius, Breslau, 1777; and 3. The Life of Sethos, taken from private Memoirs of the ancient Egyptians; translated from a Greek MS. into French, and now done into English, by M. Lediard, London, 1732.

In this romance he has given an account of the initiation of his hero, Sethos, an Egyptian prince, into the Egyptian mysteries. We must not, however, be led into the error, into which Kloss says that the Masonic fraternity fell on its first appearance, that this account is a well-proved, historical narrative. Much as we know of the Egyptian mysteries, compared with our knowledge of the Grecian or the Asiatic, we have no sufficient documents from which to obtain the consecutive and minute detail which the Abbé Terrasson has constructed. It is like Ramsay's Travels of Cyrus, to which it has been compared—a romance rather than a history; but it still contains so many scintillations of truth, so much of the substantials of fact amid the ornaments of fiction, that it cannot but prove instructive as well as amusing. We have in it the outlines of an initiation into the Egyptian mysteries such as the learned Abbé could derive from the documents and monuments to which he was able to apply, with many lacunæ which he has filled up from his own inventive and poetic genius.

Terrible Brother. French, Frère terrible. An officer in the French Rite, who in an initiation conducts the candidate, and in this respect performs the duty of a Senior Deacon in the York Rite.

Territorial Jurisdiction. It has now become the settled principle of, at least, American Masonic law, that Masonic and political jurisdiction should be coterminous, that is, that the boundaries which circumscribe the territorial jurisdiction of a Grand Lodge should be the same as those which define the political limits of the State in which it exists. And so it follows that if a State should change its political boundaries, the Masonic boundaries of the Grand Lodge should change with it. Thus, if a State should diminish its extent by the cession of any part of its territory to an adjoining State, the Lodges situated within the ceded territory would pass over to the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of the State to which that territory had been ceded.

Tessellated. From the Latin tessella, a little square stone. Chequered, formed in little squares of Mosaic work. Applied in Masonry to the Mosaic pavement of the Temple, and to the border which surrounds the tracing-board, probably incorrectly in the latter instance. See Tessellated Border.

Tessellated Border. Browne says in his Master Key, which is supposed to present the general form of the Prestonian lectures, that the ornaments of a Lodge are the Mosaic pavement, the Blazing Star, and the Tessellated Border; and he defines the Tessellated Border to be "the skirt-work round the Lodge." Webb, in his lectures, teaches that the ornaments of a Lodge are the Mosaic pavement, the indented tessel, and the blazing star; and he defines the indented tessel to be that "beautifully tessellated border or skirting which surrounded the ground-floor of King Solomon's Temple." The French call it "la houpe dentelée," which is literally the indented tessel; and they describe it as "a cord forming true-lovers' knots, which surrounds the tracing-board." The Germans call it "die Schnur von starken Faden," or the cord of strong threads, and define it as a border surrounding the tracing-board of an Entered Apprentice, consisting of a cord tied in lovers' knots, with two tassels attached to the ends.

The idea prevalent in America, and derived from a misapprehension of the plate in the Monitor of Cross, that the tessellated border was a decorated part of the Mosaic pavement, and made like it of little square stones, does not seem to be supported by these definitions. They all indicate that the tessellated border was a cord. The interpretation of its symbolic meaning still further sustains this idea. Browne says "it alludes to that kind care of Providence which so cheerfully surrounds and keeps us within its protection whilst we justly and uprightly govern our lives and actions by the four cardinal virtues in divinity, namely, temperance, fortitude, prudence, and justice." This last allusion is to the four tassels attached to the cord. (See Tassels.)

Webb says that it is "emblematic of those blessings and comforts which surround us, and which we hope to obtain by a faithful reliance on Divine Providence."

The French ritual says that it is intended "to teach the Mason that the society of which he constitutes a part surrounds the earth, and that distance, so far from relaxing the bonds which unite the members to each other, ought to draw them closer."

Lenning says that it symbolizes the fraternal bond by which all Masons are united.

But Gädicke is more precise. He defines it as "the universal bond by which every Mason ought to be united to his brethren," and he says that "it should consist of sixty threads or yarns, because, according to the ancient statutes, no Lodge was allowed to have above sixty members."

Oliver (Landm., i. 174,) says "the Tracing-Board is surrounded by an indented or tessellated border . . . at the four angles appear as many tassels." But in the old English tracing-boards the two lower tassels are often omitted. They are, however, generally found in the French. Lenning, speaking, I suppose, for the German, assigns to them but two. Four tassels are, however, necessary to complete the symbolism, which is said to be that of the four cardinal virtues. The tessellated, more properly, therefore, the tassellated, border consists of a cord intertwined with knots, to each end of which is appended a tassel. It surrounds the border of the tracing-board, and appears at the top in the following form:

There is, however, in these old tracing-boards another border, which surrounds the entire picture with lines, as in the following figure:

This indented border, which was made to represent a cord of black and white threads, was, I think, in time mistaken for tessellae, or little stones; an error probably originating in confounding it with the tessellated pavement, which was another one of the ornaments of the Lodge.

We find that we have for this symbol five different names: in English, the indented tassel, the indented tassel, the indented tassel, the tassellated border, and the tessellated border; in French, the houpe dentelée, or indented tassel; and in German, the Schnur von starken Faden, or the cord of strong threads.

The question what is the true tessellated border would not be a difficult one to answer, if it were not for the variety of names given to it in the English rituals. We know by tradition, and by engravings that have been preserved, that during the ceremonies of initiation in the early part of the last century the symbols of the Order were marked out in chalk on the floor, and that this picture was encircled by a waving cord. This cord was ornamented with tassels, and formerly a border to the tracing on the floor was called the indented tassel, the cord and the tufts attached to it being the tassel, which, being by its wavy direction partly in and partly outside of the picture, was said to be indented. This indented tassel was subsequently corrupted by illiterate Masons into indented tassel, the appellation met with in some of the early catechisms.

Afterwards, looking to its decoration with tassels and to its position as a border to the tracing-board, it was called the tassellated border. In time the picture on the floor was transferred to a permanent tracing-board, and then the tassels were preserved at the top, and the rest of the cord was represented around the board in the form of white and black angular spaces. These were mistaken for little stones, and the tassellated border was called, by a natural corruption, the tessellated border. Many years ago, when I first met with the idea of this corruption from tassellated to tessellated, which was suggested to Dr. Oliver by "a learned Scottish Mason," whose name he does not give, I was inclined to doubt its correctness. Subsequent investigations have led me to change that opinion. I think that I can readily trace the gradual steps of corruption and change from the original name indented tassel, which the early French Masons had literally translated by houpe dentelée, to indented tassel, and sometimes, according to Oliver, to indented tassel; then to tassellated border, and, finally, to tessellated border, the name which it now bears.

The form and the meaning of the symbol are now apparent. The tessellated border, as it is called, is a cord, decorated with tassels, which surrounds the tracing-board of an Entered Apprentice, the said tracing-board being a representation of the Lodge, and it symbolizes the bond of love—the mystic tie—which binds the Craft wheresoever dispersed into one band of brotherhood.

Tessel, Indented, See Tessellated Border.

Tessera Hospitalis. Latin. Literally, "the token of the guest," or "the hospitable die." It was a custom among the ancients, that when two persons formed an alliance of friendship, they took a small piece of bone, ivory, stone, or even wood, which they divided into two parts, each one inscribing his name upon his half. They then made an exchange of the pieces, each promising to retain the part intrusted to him as a perpetual token of the covenant into which they had entered, of which its production at any future time would be a proof and a reminder. See the subject more fully treated in the article Mark.

Testimony. In Masonic trials the testimony of witnesses is taken in two ways—that of profanes by affidavit, and that of Masons on their Masonic obligation.

Tests. Test questions, to which the conventional answers would prove the Masonic character of the person interrogated, were in very common use in the last century in England. They were not, it is true, enjoined by authority, but were conventionally used to such an extent that every Mason was supposed to be acquainted with them. They are now obsolete; but not a quarter of a century ago I heard such "catch questions" as "Where does the Master hang his hat?" and a few others equally trivial, used in this country.

Oliver gives (Golden Remains, iv. 14,) the following as the tests in use in the early part of the last century. They were introduced by Desaguliers and Anderson at the revival in 1717. Some of them, however, were of a higher character, being taken from the catechism or lecture then in use as a part of the instructions of the Entered Apprentice.

What is the place of the Senior Entered Apprentice?

What are the fixed lights?

How ought the Master to be served?

What is the punishment of a cowan?

What is the bone box?

How is it said to be opened only with ivory keys?

By what is the key suspended?

What is the clothing of a Mason?

What is the brand?

How high was the door of the middle chamber?

What does this stone smell of?

The name of an Entered Apprentice?

The name of a Fellow Craft?

The name of Master Mason?

In the year 1730, Martin Clare having, by order of the Grand Lodge, remodelled the lectures, he abolished the old tests and introduced the following new ones.

Whence came you?

Who brought you here?

What recommendation do you bring?

Do you know the secrets of Masonry?

Where do you keep them?

Have you the key?

Where is it deposited?

When you were made a Mason, what did you consider most desirable?

What is the name of your Lodge?

Where is it situated?

What is its foundation?

How did you enter the Temple of Solomon?

How many windows did you see there?

What is the duty of the youngest apprentice?

Have you ever worked as a Mason?

What did you work with?

Salute me as a Mason.

Ten years afterwards Clare's tests were superseded by a new series of "examination questions," which were promulgated by Dr. Manningham, and very generally adopted. They are as follows:

Where were you made a Mason?

What did you learn there?

How do you hope to be rewarded?

What access have you to that Grand Lodge?

How many steps?

What are their names?

How many qualifications are required in a Mason?

What is the standard of a Mason's faith?

What is the standard of his actions?

Can you name the peculiar characteristics of a Mason's Lodge?

What is the interior composed of?

Why are we termed Brethren?

By what badge is a Mason distinguished?

To what do the reports refer?

How many principal points are there in Masonry?

To what do they refer?

Their names?

The allusion?

Thomas Dunckerley subsequently made a new arrangement of the lectures, and with them the tests. For the eighteen which composed the series of Manningham, he invented ten, but which were more significant and important in their bearing. They were as follows:

How ought a Mason to be clothed?

When were you born?

Where were you born?

How were you born?

Did you endure the brand with fortitude and patience?

The situation of the Lodge?

What is its name?

With what have you worked as a Mason?

Explain the sprig of Cassia.

How old are you?

Preston subsequently, as his first contribution to Masonic literature, presented the following system of tests, which were at a later period adopted.

Whither are you bound?

Are you a Mason?

How do you know that?

How will you prove it to me?

Where were you made a Mason?

When were you made a Mason?

By whom were you made a Mason?

From whence come you?

What recommendation do you bring?

Any other recommendation?

Where are the secrets of Masonry kept?

To whom do you deliver them?

How do you deliver them?

In what manner do you serve your Master?

What is your name?

What is the name of your son?

If a Brother were lost, where should you hope to find him?

How should you expect him to be clothed?

How blows a Mason's wind?

Why does it thus blow?

What time is it?

These Prestonian tests continued in use until the close of the last century, and Dr. Oliver says that at his initiation, in 1801, he was fully instructed in them.

Tests of this kind appear to have existed at an early period. The "examination of a Steinmetz," given by Findel in his History of Freemasonry, presents all the characteristics of the English "tests."

The French Masons have one, "Comment êtes vous entré dans le Temple de Salomon?" and in this country, besides the one already mentioned, there are a few others which are sometimes used, but without legal authority. A review of these tests will, I think, lead to the conclusion adopted by Oliver, that "they are doubtless of great utility, but in their selection a pure and discriminating taste has not always been used."

Test Word. In the year 1829, during the anti-Masonic excitement in this country, the Grand Lodge of New York proposed, as a safeguard against "the introduction of impostors among the workmen," a test word to be used in all examinations in addition to the legitimate tests. But as this was deemed an innovation on the landmarks, and as it was impossible that it could ever become universal, the Grand Lodges of the United States very properly rejected it, and it was never used.

Tetractys. The Greek word τετρακτύς signifies, literally, the number four, and is therefore synonymous with the quaternion; but it has been peculiarly applied to a symbol of the Pythagoreans, which is composed of ten dots arranged in a triangular form of four rows.

This figure was in itself, as a whole, emblematic of the Tetragrammaton, or sacred name of four letters, (for tetractys, in Greek, means four), and was undoubtedly learned by Pythagoras during his visit to Babylon. But the parts of which it is composed were also pregnant symbols. Thus the one point was a symbol of the active principle or creator, the two points of the passive principle or matter, the three of the world proceeding from their union, and the four of the liberal arts and sciences, which may be said to complete and perfect that world.

This arrangement of the ten points in a triangular form was called the tetractys or number four, because each of the sides of the triangle consisted of four points, and the whole number of ten was made up by the summation of the first four figures, $1 + 2 + 3 + 4 = 10$.

Hierocles says, in his Commentaries on the Golden Verses (v. 47): "But how comes God to be the Tetractys? This thou mayst learn in the sacred book ascribed to Pythagoras, in which God is celebrated as the number of numbers. For if all things exist by His eternal decrees, it is evident that in each species of things the number depends on the cause that produces them. . . . Now the power of ten is four; for before we come to a complete and perfect decade, we discover all the virtue and perfection of the ten in the four. Thus, in assembling all numbers from one to four inclusive, the whole composition makes ten," etc.

And Dacier, in his Notes on these Commentaries and on this particular passage, remarks that "Pythagoras, having learned in Egypt the name of the true God, the mysterious and ineffable name Jehovah, and finding that in the original tongue it was composed of four letters, translated it into his own language by the word tetractys, and gave the true explanation of it, saying that it properly signified the source of nature that perpetually rolls along."

So much did the disciples of Pythagoras venerate the tetractys, that it is said that they took their most solemn oaths, especially that of initiation, upon it. The exact words of the oath are given in the Golden Verses, and are referred to by Jamblichus in his Life of Pythagoras:

Ναὶ μὰ τὸν ἀμείντα ψυχῆ παραδόντα τετρακτὺν
Παγὰν ἀνάου φύσεως, ἀλλ' ἔρχου ἐν' ἔργον.

i. e.,

"I swear it by him who has transmitted into our soul the sacred tetractys,
The source of nature, whose course is eternal."

Jamblichus gives a different phraseology of the oath, but with substantially the same meaning. In the symbols of Masonry, we will find the sacred delta bearing the nearest analogy to the tetractys of the Pythagoreans.

The outline of these points form, it will be perceived, a triangle; and if we draw short lines from point to point, we will have within this great triangle nine smaller ones. Dr. Hemming, in his revision of the English lectures, adopted in 1813, thus explains this symbol:

"The great triangle is generally denominated Pythagorean, because it served as a principal illustration of that philosopher's system. This emblem powerfully elucidates the mystical relation between the numerical and geometrical symbols. It is composed of ten points, so arranged as to form one great equilateral triangle, and at the same time to divide it into nine similar triangles of smaller dimensions. The first of these, representing unity, is called a monad, and answers to what is denominated a point in geometry, each being the principle by the multiplication of which all combinations of form and number are respectively generated. The next two points are denominated a duad, representing the number two, and answers to the geometrical line which, consisting of length without breadth, is bounded by two extreme points. The three following points are called the triad, representing the number three, and may be considered as having an indissoluble relation to all superficies, which consist of length and breadth, when contemplated as abstracted from thickness."

Dr. Hemming does not appear to have improved on the Pythagorean symbolization.

Tetragrammaton. In Greek, it signifies a word of four letters. It is the title given by the Talmudists to the name of God Jehovah, which in the original Hebrew consists of four letters, יהוה. See Jehovah.

Teutonic Knights. The origin of this Order was a humble but a pious one. During the Crusades, a wealthy gentleman of Germany, who resided at Jerusalem, commiserating the condition of his countrymen who came there as pilgrims, made his house their receptacle, and afterwards built a hospital, to which, by the permission of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, he added an oratory dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Other Germans coming from Lubeck and Bremen contributed to the extension of this charity, and erected at Acre, during the third Crusade, a sumptuous hospital, and assumed the title of Teutonic Knights, or Brethren of the Hospital of our Lady of the Germans of Jerusalem. They elected Henry Walpott their first Master, and adopted for their government a Rule closely approximating to that both of the Templars and the Hospitallers, with an additional one that none but Germans should be admitted into the Order. Their dress consisted of a white mantle, with a black cross embroidered in gold. Clark says (Hist. of Knighthood, ii. 60,) that the original badge, which was assigned to them by the Emperor Henry VI., was a black cross potent; and that form of cross has ever since been known as a Teutonic Cross. John, king of Jerusalem, added the cross double potent gold, that is, a cross potent of gold on the black cross. The Emperor Frederick II. gave them the black double-headed eagle, to be borne in an inescutcheon in the centre of the cross; and St. Louis, of France, added to it, as an augmentation, a blue chief strewn with fleur-de-lis.

During the siege of Acre they did good service to the Christian cause; but on the fall of that city, the main body returned to Europe with Frederick II. For many years they were engaged in crusades against the pagan inhabitants of Prussia and Poland. Ashmole says that in 1340 they built the city of Maryburg, and there established the residence of their Grand Master. They were for a long time engaged in contests with the kings of Poland on account of their invasion of their territory. They were excommunicated by Pope John XXII., but relying on their great strength, and the remoteness of their province, they bid defiance to ecclesiastical censures, and the contest ended in their receiving Prussia proper as a brief of the kings of Poland.

In 1511, Albert, Margrave of Brandenburg, was elected their Grand Master. In 1525 he abandoned the vows of his Order; became a Protestant, and exchanged his title of Grand Master for that of Duke of Eastern Prussia; and thus the dominion of the Knights was brought to an end, and the foundation laid of the future kingdom of Prussia.

The Order, however, still continued its existence, the seat of the Grand Master being at Mergentheim, in Swabia. By the peace of Presburg, in 1805, the Emperor Francis II. obtained the Grand Mastership, with all its rights and privileges. In 1809 Napoleon abolished the Order, but it still has a titular existence in Austria.

Attempts have been made to incorporate the Teutonic Knights into Masonry, and their cross has been adopted in some of the high degrees. But we fail to find in history the slightest traces of any actual connection between the two Orders.

Texas. Freemasonry was introduced in Texas by the formation of a Lodge at Brazoria, which met for the first time, December 27, 1835. The Dispensation for this Lodge was granted by J. H. Holland, Grand Master of Louisiana, and in his honor the Lodge was called Holland Lodge, No. 36. It continued to meet until February, 1836, when the war with Mexico put an end to its labors for the time. In October, 1837, it was reopened at Houston, a Charter having in the interval been issued for it by the Grand Lodge of Louisiana. In the meantime two other Lodges had been chartered by the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, Milan, No. 40, at Nacogdoches, and McFarlane, No. 41, at San Augustine. Delegates from these Lodges met at Houston, December 20, 1837, and organized the Grand Lodge of the Republic of Texas, Anson Jones being elected Grand Master.

The introduction of Royal Arch Masonry into Texas was accompanied with some difficulties. In 1838, the General Grand Chapter of the United States granted a Charter for a Chapter at San Felipe de Austin. The members, finding it impracticable to meet at that place, assumed the responsibility of opening it at Galveston, which was done June 2, 1840. This irregular action was, on application, healed by the General Grand Chapter. Subsequently this body united with two illegal Chapters in the Republic to form a Grand Chapter. This body was declared illegal by the General Grand Chapter, and Masonic intercourse with it prohibited. The Chapter at Galveston submitted to the decree, and the so-called Grand Chapter of Texas was dissolved. Charters were then granted by the General Grand Chapter to seven other Chapters, and in 1850 the Grand Chapter of Texas was duly established.

The Grand Commandery of Texas was organized January 19, 1855.

T.: G.: A.: O.: T.: U.: The initials of The Grand Architect of The Universe. Often used in this abbreviated form by Masonic writers.

Tammuz. Spelled also Tammuz. A deity worshipped by the apostate Jews in the time of Ezekiel, and supposed by most commentators to be identical with the Syrian god Adonis. See Adonis, Mysteries of.

Thanks. It is a usage of French Masonry, and in the high degrees of some other Rites, for the candidate, after his initiation and the address of the orator to him, to return thanks to the Lodge for the honor that has been conferred upon him. It is a voluntary and not an obligatory duty, and is not practised in the Lodges of the York and American Rites.

Theism. Theological writers have defined theism as being the belief in the existence of a deity who, having created the world, directs its government by the constant exercise of his beneficent power, in contradistinction to atheism, which denies the existence of any such creative and superintending being. In this sense, theism is the fundamental religion of Masonry, on which is superimposed the additional and peculiar tenets of each of its disciples.

Theocratic Philosophy of Freemasonry. This is a term invented by Dr. Oliver to indicate that view of Freemasonry which intimately connects its symbols with the teachings of pure religion, and traces them to the primeval revelations of God to man, so that the philosophy of Masonry shall develop the continual government of the Divine Being. Hence he says: "It is the Theocratic Philosophy of Freemasonry that commands our unqualified esteem, and seals in our heart that love for the Institution which will produce an active religious faith and practice, and lead in the end to 'a building not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'" He has developed this system in one of his works entitled, The Theocratic Philosophy of Freemasonry, in twelve lectures on its Speculative, Operative, and Spurious Branches. In this work he enters with great minuteness into an examination of the speculative character of the Institution and of its operative division, which he contends had been practised as an exclusively scientific pursuit from the earliest times in every country of the world. Many of the legendary speculations advanced in this work will be rejected at this day as unsound and untenable, but his views of the true philosophy of Freemasonry are worthy of profound study.

Theological Virtues. Under the name of the Cardinal Virtues, because all the other virtues hinged upon them, the ancient Pagans gave the most prominent place in their system of ethics to Temperance, Prudence, Fortitude, and Justice. But the three virtues taught in the theology of St. Paul, Faith, Hope, and Charity, as such were unknown to them. To these, as taking a higher place and being more intimately connected with the relations of man to God, Christian writers have given the name of the Theological Virtues. They have been admitted into the system of Masonry, and are symbolized in the Theological ladder of Jacob.

Theoricus. The twelfth degree of the German Rose Croix.

Theosophists. There were many theosophists—enthusiasts whom Vaughan calls "noble specimens of the mystic"—but those with whom the history of Masonry has most to do were the mystical religious thinkers of the last century, who supposed that they were possessed of a knowledge of the Divinity and his works by supernatural inspiration, or who regarded the foundation of their mystical tenets as resting on a sort of Divine intuition. Such were Swedenborg, who, if not himself a Masonic reformer, has supplied the materials of many degrees; the Moravian brethren, the object of whose association is said to have been originally the propagation of the Gospel under the Masonic veil; St. Martin, the founder of the Philalethans; Pernetty, to whom we owe the Order of Illuminati at Avignon; and Chastanier, who was the inventor of the Rite of Illuminated Theosophists. The object proposed in all these theosophic degrees was the regeneration of man, and his reintegration into the primitive innocence from which he had fallen by original sin. Theosophic Masonry was, in fact, nothing else than an application of the speculative ideas of Jacob Böhme, of Swedenborg, and other mystical philosophers of the same class. Vaughan, in his Hours with the Mystics, (ii. 46,) thus describes the earlier theosophists of the fourteenth century: "They believed devoutly in the genuineness of the Kabbala. They were persuaded that, beneath all the floods of change, this oral tradition had perpetuated its life unharmed from the days of Moses downward—even as Jewish fable taught them that the cedars alone, of all trees, had continued to spread the strength of their invulnerable arms below the waters of the deluge. They rejoiced in the hidden lore of that book as in a treasure rich with the germs of all philosophy. They maintained that from its marvellous leaves man might learn the angelic heraldry of the skies, the mysteries of the Divine nature, the means of converse with the potentates of heaven."

Add to this an equal reverence for the unfathomable mysteries contained in the prophecies of Daniel and the vision of the Evangelist, with a proneness to give to everything divine a symbolic interpretation, and you have the true character of those later theosophists who labored to invent their particular systems of Masonry. For more of this subject, see the article on Saint Martin.

Nothing now remains of theosophic Masonry except the few traces left through the influence of Zinnendorf in the Swedish system, and what we find in the Apocalyptic degrees of the Scottish Rite. The systems of Swedenborg, Pernetty, Paschalis, St. Martin, and Chastanier have all become obsolete.

Therapeutæ. An ascetic sect of Jews in the first century after Christ, whom Milman calls the ancestors of the Christian monks and hermits. They resided near Alexandria, in Egypt, and bore a striking resemblance in their doctrines to those of the Essenians. They were, however, much influenced by the mystical school of Alexandria, and, while they borrowed much from the Kabbala, partook also in their speculations of Pythagorean and Orphic ideas. Their system pervades some of the high degrees of Masonry. The best account of them is given by Philo Judæus.

Theurgy. From the Greek Theos, God, and ergon, work. The ancients thus called the whole art of magic, because they believed its operations to be the result of an intercourse with the gods. But the moderns have appropriated it to that species of magic which operates by celestial means as opposed to natural magic, which is effected by a knowledge of the occult powers of nature, and necromancy or magic effected by the aid of evil spirits. Attempts have been made by some speculative authors to apply this high magic, as it is also called, to an interpretation of Masonic symbolism. The most notorious and the most prolific writer on this subject is Louis Alphonse Constance, who, under the name of Eliphas Levy, has given to the world numerous works on the dogma and ritual, the history and the interpretation, of this theurgic Masonry.

Third Degree. See Master Mason.

Thirty-Second Degree. See Prince of the Royal Secret.

Thirty-Six. In the Pythagorean doctrine of numbers, 36 symbolized the male and female powers of nature united, because it is composed of the sum of the four odd numbers, $1 + 3 + 5 + 7 = 16$, added to the sum of the four even numbers, $2 + 4 + 6 + 8 = 20$, for $16 + 20 = 36$. It has, however, no place among the sacred numbers of Masonry.

Thirty-Third Degree. See Sovereign Grand Inspector General.

Thory, Claude Antoine. A distinguished French Masonic writer, who was born at Paris, May 26, 1759. He was by profession an advocate, and held the official position of Registrar of the Criminal Court of the Chatelet, and afterwards of first adjunct of the Mayor of Paris. He was a member of several learned societies, and a naturalist of considerable reputation. He devoted his attention more particularly to botany, and published several valuable works on the genus Rosa, and also one on strawberries, which was published after his death.

Thory took an important part, both as an actor and a writer, in the Masonic history of France. He was a member of the Lodge "Saint Alexandre d'Ecosse," and of the "Contrat Social," out of whose incorporation into one proceeded the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite, of which Thory may be justly called the founder. He was at its constitution made the presiding officer, and afterwards its treasurer, and keeper of its archives. In this last capacity, he made a collection of rare and valuable manuscripts, books, medals, seals, jewels, bronze figures, and other objects connected with Freemasonry. Under his administration, the library and museum of the Mother Lodge became perhaps the most valuable collection of the kind in France or in any other country. After the Mother Lodge had ceased its labors in 1826, this collection passed by a previous stipulation into the possession of the Lodge of Mont Thabor, which was the oldest of the Rite.

Thory, while making collections for the Lodge, had amassed for himself a fund of the most valuable materials towards the history of Freemasonry, which he used with great effect in his subsequent publications. In 1813 he published the Annales Originis Magni Galliarum Orientis, ou Histoire de la Fondation du Grand Orient de France, in 1 vol., 8vo; and in 1815 his Acta Latomorum, ou Chronologie de l'Histoire de la Frano-Maçonnerie, Française et étrangère, in 2 vols., 8vo.

The value of these works, especially of the latter, if not as well-digested histories, certainly as important contributions for Masonic history, cannot be denied. Yet they have been variously appreciated by his contemporaries. Rebold (Hist. des 3 G. L., p. 531,) says of the Annales, that it is one of the best historical productions that French Masonic literature possesses; while Besuchet (Précis Historique, ii. 275,) charges that he has attempted to discharge the functions of a historian without exactitude and without impartiality. These discordant views are to be attributed to the active part that Thory took in the contests between the Grand Orient and the Scottish Rite, and the opposition which he offered to the claims of the former to the Supreme Masonic authority. Posterity will form its judgment on the character of Thory as a Masonic historian without reference to the evanescent rivalry of parties. He died in October, 1827.

Thoux de Salvarte. Founder in 1763, at Warsaw, of the Academy of Secrets, which see.

Thread of Life. In the earliest lectures of the last century, we find this catechism:

Q. "Have you the key of the Lodge?"

A. "Yes, I have."

Q. "What is its virtue?"

A. "To open and shut, and shut and open."

Q. "Where do you keep it?"

A. "In an ivory box, between my tongue and my teeth, or within my heart, where all my secrets are kept."

Q. "Have you the chain to the key?"

A. "Yes, I have."

Q. "How long is it?"

A. "As long as from my tongue to my heart."

In a later lecture, this key is said to "hang by a tow line nine inches or a span." And later still, in the old Prestonian lecture, it is said to hang by "the thread of life, in the passage of entrance, nine inches or a span long, the supposed distance between guttural and pectoral." All of which is intended simply to symbolize the close connection which in every Mason should exist between his tongue and his heart, so that the one may utter nothing that the other does not truly dictate.

Three. Everywhere among the ancients the number three was deemed the most sacred of numbers. A reverence for its mystical virtues is to be found even among the Chinese, who say that numbers begin at one and are made perfect at three, and hence they denote the multiplicity of any object by repeating the character which stands for it three times. In the philosophy of Plato, it was the image of the Supreme Being, because it includes in itself the properties of the two first numbers, and because, as Aristotle says, it contains within itself a beginning, a middle, and an end.

The Pythagoreans called it perfect harmony. So sacred was this number deemed by the ancients, that we find it designating some of the attributes of almost all the gods. The thunder-bolt of Jove was three-forked; the sceptre of Neptune was a trident; Cerberus, the dog of Pluto, was three-headed; there were three Fates and three Furies; the sun had three names, Apollo, Sol, and Liber; and the moon three also, Diana, Luna, and Hecate. In all incantations, three was a favorite number, for, as Virgil says, "numero Deus impari gaudet," God delights in an odd number. A triple cord was used, each cord of three different colors, white, red, and black; and a small image of the subject of the charm was carried thrice around the altar, as we see in Virgil's eighth eclogue:

"Terna tibi hæc primum, triplici diversa colore,
Licia circumdo, terque hanc altaria circum
Effigiem duco."

i. e.,

"First I surround thee with these three pieces of list, and I carry thy image three times round the altars."

The Druids paid no less respect to this sacred number. Throughout their whole system, a reference is constantly made to its influence; and so far did their veneration for it extend, that even their sacred poetry was composed in triads.

In all the mysteries, from Egypt to Scandinavia, we find a sacred regard for the number three. In the rites of Mithras, the Empyrean was said to be supported by three intelligences, Ormuzd, Mithra, and Mithras. In the rites of Hindustan, there was the trinity of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. It was, in short, a general character of the mysteries to have three principal officers and three grades of initiation.

In Freemasonry, the ternary is the most sacred of all the mystical numbers. Beginning with the old axiom of the Roman Artificers, that tres faciunt collegium, or it requires three to make a college, they have established the rule that not less than three shall congregate to form a Lodge. Then in all the Rites, whatever may be the number of superimposed grades, there lie at the basis the three symbolic degrees. There are in all the degrees three principal officers, three supports, three greater and three lesser lights, three movable and three immovable jewels, three principal tenets, three working-tools of a Fellow Craft, three principal orders of architecture, three chief human senses, three Ancient Grand Masters. In fact, everywhere in the system the number three is presented as a prominent symbol. So much is this the case, that all the other mystical numbers depend upon it, for each is a multiple of three, its square or its cube, or derived from them. Thus, 9, 27, 81, are formed by the multiplication of three, as $3 \times 3 = 9$, and $3^2 \times 3 = 27$, and $3^3 \times 3^2 = 81$.

But in nothing is the Masonic signification of the ternary made more interesting than in its connection with the sacred delta, the symbol of Deity. See Triangle.

Three Globes, Rite of the Grand Lodge of the. On September 13, 1740, the Lodge of the Three Globes, zu den drei Weltkugeln, was established in the city of Berlin, Prussia. In 1744 it assumed the rank and title of a Grand Mother Lodge. It is now one of the three Prussian Grand Lodges. At first it worked, like all the other Lodges of Germany, in the English system of three degrees, and adopted the English Book of Constitutions as its law. But it subsequently became infected with the high degrees, which were at one time so popular in Germany, and especially with the Strict Observance system of Von Hund, which it accepted in 1766. At the extinction of that system the Grand Lodge adopted one of its own, in doing which it was assisted by the labors of Dr. I. F. Zöllner, the Grand Master. Its Rite consists of seven high degrees added to the three primitive. The latter are under the control of the Grand Lodge; but the seven higher ones are governed by an Internal Supreme Orient, whose members are, however, elected by the Grand Lodge. The Rite is practised by about two hundred Lodges in Germany.

Three Grand Offerings. See Ground-Floor of the Lodge.

Three Points. Three points in a triangular form (∴) are placed after letters in a Masonic document to indicate that such letters are the initials of a Masonic title or of a technical word in Masonry, as G.∴ M.∴ for Grand Master, or G.∴ L.∴ for Grand Lodge. It is not a symbol, but simply a mark of abbreviation. The attempt, therefore, to trace it to the Hebrew three yods, a Kabbalistic sign of the Tetragrammaton, or any other ancient symbol, is futile. It is an abbreviation, and nothing more; although it is probable that the idea was suggested by the sacred character of the number three as a Masonic number, and these three dots might refer to the position of the three officers in a French Lodge. Ragon says (Orthod. Maçon., p. 71,) that the mark was first used by the Grand Orient of France in a circular issued August 12, 1774, in which we read "G.∴ O.∴ de France." The abbreviation is now constantly used in French documents, and, although not accepted by the English Masons, has been very generally adopted in other countries. In the United States, the use of this abbreviation is gradually extending.

Three Senses. Of the five human senses, the three which are the most important in Masonic symbolism are Seeing, Hearing, and Feeling, because of their respective reference to certain modes of recognition, and because, by their use, Masons are enabled to practise that universal language the possession of which is the boast of the Order.

Three Steps. See Steps on the Master's Carpet.

Threshing-Floor. Among the Hebrews, circular spots of hard ground were used, as now, for the purpose of threshing corn. After they were properly prepared for the purpose, they became permanent possessions. One of these, the property of Ornan the Jebusite, was on Mount Moriah. It was purchased by David, for a place of sacrifice, for six hundred shekels of gold, and on it the Temple was afterwards built. Hence it is sometimes used as a symbolic name for the Temple of Solomon or for a Master's Lodge. Thus it is said in the ritual that the Mason comes "from the lofty tower of Babel, where language was confounded and Masonry lost," and that he is travelling "to the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite, where language was restored and Masonry found." The interpretation of this rather abstruse symbolic expression is that on his initiation the Mason comes out of the profane world, where there is ignorance and darkness and confusion as there was at Babel, and that he is approaching the Masonic world, where, as at the Temple built on Ornan's threshing-floor, there is knowledge and light and order.

Throne. The seat occupied by the Grand Master in the Grand Lodge of England is called the throne, in allusion, probably, to the throne of Solomon. In American Grand Lodges it is styled the Oriental Chair of Solomon, a title which is also given to the seat of the Master of a subordinate Lodge.

In ecclesiology, the seat in a cathedral occupied by a bishop is called a throne; and in the Middle Ages, according to Du Cange, the same title was not only applied to the seats of bishops, but often also to those of abbots, or even priests who were in possession of titles or churches.

Thummin. See Urim and Thummin.

Tie. The first clause in the covenant of Masonry which refers to the preservation of the secrets is technically called the tie. It is substantially the same in the covenant of each degree, from the lowest to the highest.

Tie, Mystic. See Mystic Tie.

Tierce, De la. He was the first translator of Anderson's Constitutions into French, the manuscript of which he says that he prepared during his residence in London. He afterwards published it at Frankfort, in 1743, with the title of Histoire, obligations et statuts de la très vénérable confraternité des Francs-Maçons, tirez de leur archives et conformés aux traditions les plus anciennes, etc. De la Tierce is said to have been, while in London, an intimate friend of Anderson, the first edition of whose Constitutions he used when he compiled his manuscript in 1725. But he improved on Anderson's work by dividing the history in epochs. This course Anderson pursued in his second edition; which circumstance has led Schneider, in the Neuen Journal zur Freimaurerei, to suppose that, in writing that second edition, Anderson was aided by the previous labors of De la Tierce, of whose work he was most probably in possession.

Tile. A Lodge is said to be tiled when the necessary precautions have been taken to prevent the approach of unauthorized persons; and it is said to be the first duty of every Mason to see that this is done before the Lodge is opened. The word to tile is sometimes used in the same sense as to examine, as when it is said that a visitor has been tiled, that is, has been examined. But the expression is not in general use, nor do I think that it is a correct employment of the term.

Tiler. An officer of a symbolic Lodge, whose duty is to guard the door of the Lodge, and to permit no one to pass in who is not duly qualified, and who has not the permission of the Master.

A necessary qualification of a Tiler is, therefore, that he should be a Master Mason. Although the Lodge may be opened in an inferior degree, no one who has not advanced to the third degree can legally discharge the functions of Tiler.

As the Tiler is always compensated for his services, he is considered, in some sense, as the servant of the Lodge. It is, therefore, his duty to prepare the Lodge for its meetings, to arrange the furniture in its proper place, and to make all other arrangements for the convenience of the Lodge.

The Tiler need not be a member of the Lodge which he tiles; and in fact, in large cities, one brother very often performs the duties of Tiler of several Lodges.

This is a very important office, and, like that of the Master and Wardens, owes its existence, not to any conventional regulations, but to the very landmarks of the Order; for, from the peculiar nature of our Institution, it is evident that there never could have been a meeting of Masons for Masonic purposes, unless a Tiler had been present to guard the Lodge from intrusion.

The title is derived from the operative art; for as in Operative Masonry the Tiler, when the edifice is erected, finishes and covers it with the roof (of tiles), so in Speculative Masonry, when the Lodge is duly organized, the Tiler closes the door, and covers the sacred precincts from all intrusion.

Tiler's Oath. See Oath, Tiler's.

Tilly de Grasse. See Grasse, Tilly de.

Timbre. The French Masons so call a stamp, consisting of the initials or monogram of the Lodge, which is impressed in black or red ink upon every official document emanating from the Lodge. When such a document has the seal also attached, it is said to be "timbrée et scellée," i. e., stamped and sealed. The timbre, which differs from the seal, is not used in English or American Lodges.

Time. The image of Time, under the conventional figure of a winged old man with the customary scythe and hour-glass, has been adopted as one of the modern symbols in the third degree. He is represented as attempting to disentangle the ringlets of a weeping virgin who stands before him. This, which is apparently a never-ending task, but one which Time undertakes to perform, is intended to teach the Mason that time, patience, and perseverance will enable him to accomplish the great object of a Mason's labor, and at last to obtain that true Word which is the symbol of Divine Truth. Time, therefore, is in this connection the symbol of well-directed perseverance in the performance of duty.

Time and Circumstances. The answer to the question in the ritual of initiation, "Has he made suitable proficiency?" is sometimes made, "Such as time and circumstances would permit." This is an error, and may be a mischievous one, as leading to a careless preparation of the candidate for qualification to advancement. The true reply is, "He has." See Advancement.

Tirshatha. The title given to the Persian governors of Judea. It was borne by Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. It is supposed to be derived from the Persian torsch, austere or severe, and is therefore, says Gesenius, equivalent to "Your Severity." It is in the modern ritual of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States the title of the presiding officer of a Council of Princes of Jerusalem. It is also the title of the presiding officer of the Royal Order of Heredom of Kilwinning.

Titles. The titles conferred in the rituals of Masonry upon various officers are often apparently grandiloquent, and have given occasion to some, who have not understood their true meaning, to call them absurd and bombastic. On this subject Brother Albert Pike has, in the following remarks, given a proper significance to Masonic titles:

"Some of these titles we retain; but they have with us meanings entirely consistent with the spirit of equality, which is the foundation and peremptory law of its being, of all Masonry. The Knight, with us, is he who devotes his hand, his heart, his brain to the service of Masonry, and professes himself the sworn soldier of truth: the Prince is he who aims to be chief [Principes], first, leader among his equals, in virtue and good deeds: the Sovereign is he who, one of an Order whose members are all sovereigns, is supreme only because the law and Constitutions are so which he administers, and by which he, like every other brother, is governed. The titles Puissant, Potent, Wise, and Venerable indicate that power of virtue, intelligence, and wisdom which those ought to strive to attain who are placed in high offices by the suffrages of their brethren; and all our other titles and designations have an esoteric meaning consistent with modesty and equality, and which those who receive them should fully understand."

Titles of Grand Lodges. The title of the Grand Lodge of England is "the United Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons." That of Ireland, "the Grand Masonic Lodge." Of Scotland, "the Grand Lodge of the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons." That of France is "the Grand Orient." The same title is taken by the Grand Lodges or Supreme Masonic authorities of Portugal, Belgium, Italy, Spain, and Greece, and also by the Grand Lodges of all the South American States. Of the German Grand Lodges, the only three that have distinctive titles are "the Grand National Mother Lodge of the Three Globes," "The Grand National Lodge of Germany," and "the Grand Lodge Royal York of Friendship." In Sweden and Denmark they are simply called "Grand Lodges." In the English possessions of North America they are also called "Grand Lodges." In the United States the title of the Grand Lodge of Maine, of Massachusetts, of Rhode Island, of Alabama, of Illinois, of Iowa, of Wisconsin, of Minnesota, and of Oregon, is the "Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons;" of New Hampshire, of Vermont, of New York, of New Jersey, of Pennsylvania, of Arkansas, and of Indiana, is "the Grand Lodge of the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons;" of Maryland, of the District of Columbia, of Florida, of Michigan, of Missouri, and of California, is the "Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons;" of South Carolina is the "Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free Masons;" of all the other States the title is simply the "Grand Lodge."

Tito. A significant word in the high degrees. The Scottish Rite rituals give the name of Tito, Prince Harodim, to him who they say was the first who was appointed by Solomon a Provost and Judge. This person appears to be altogether mythical; the word is not found in the Hebrew language, nor has any meaning been given to it. He is represented as having been a favorite of the king of Israel. He is said to have presided over the Lodge of Intendants of the Building, and to have been one of the twelve illustrious knights who were set over the twelve tribes, that of Naphtali being placed under his care. The whole of this legend is, of course, connected with the symbolic signification of those degrees.

Toasts. Anderson says, in his second edition, that in 1719 Dr. Desaguliers, having been installed Grand Master, "forthwith revived the old, regular, and peculiar toasts or healths of the Freemasons." If Anderson's statements could be implicitly trusted as historical facts, we should have to conclude that a system of regulated toasts prevailed in the Lodges before the revival. The custom of drinking healths at banquets is a very old one, and can be traced to the days of the ancient Greeks and Romans. From them it was handed down to the moderns, and especially in England we find the "was-hael" of the Saxons, a term used in drinking, and equivalent to the modern phrase, "Your health." Steele, in the Tatler, intimates that the word toast began to be applied to the drinking of healths in the early part of the eighteenth century. And although his account of the origin of the word has been contested, it is very evident that the drinking of toasts was a universal custom in the clubs and festive associations which were common in London about the time of the revival of Masonry. It is therefore to be presumed that the Masonic Lodges did not escape the influences of the convivial spirit of that age, and drinking in the Lodge room during the hours of refreshment was a usual custom, but, as Oliver observes, all excess was avoided, and the convivialities of Masonry were regulated by the Old Charges, which directed the brethren to enjoy themselves with decent mirth, not forcing any brother to eat or drink beyond his inclination, nor hindering him from going home when he pleased. The drinking was conducted by rule, the Master giving the toast, but first inquiring of the Senior Warden, "Are you charged in the West, Brother Senior?" and of the Junior Warden, "Are you charged in the South, Brother Junior?" to which appropriate replies being made, the toast was drunk with honors peculiar to the Institution. In an old Masonic song, the following stanza occurs:

"Are you charged in the West? are you charged in the South?"
The Worshipful Master cries.
'We are charged in the West, we are charged in the South,' Each Warden prompt replies."

One of the catechetical works of the last century thus describes the drinking customs of the Masons of that period: "The table being plentifully supplied with wine and punch, every man has a glass set before him, and fills it with what he chooses. But he must drink his glass in turn, or at least keep the motion with the rest. When, therefore, a public health is given, the Master fills first, and desires the brethren to charge their glasses; and when this is supposed to be done, the Master says, Brethren, are you all charged? The Senior and Junior Wardens answer, We are all charged in the South and West. Then they all stand up, and, observing the Master's motions, (like the soldier his right-hand man,) drink their glasses off." Another work of the same period says that the first toast given was "the King and the Craft." But a still older work gives what it calls "A Free-Mason's Health" in the following words: "Here's a health to our society and to every faithful brother that keeps his oath of secrecy. As we are sworn to love each other, the world no Order knows like this our noble and ancient Fraternity. Let them wonder at the Mystery. Here, Brother, I drink to thee."

In time the toasts improved in their style, and were deemed of so much importance that lists of them, for the benefit of those who were deficient in inventive genius, were published in all the pocket-books, calendars, and song-books of the Order. Thus a large collection is to be found in the Masonic Miscellanies of Stephen Jones. A few of them will show their technical character: "To the secret and silent;" "To the memory of the distinguished Three;" "To all that live within compass and square;" "To the memory of the Tyrant artist;" "To him that first the work began," etc.

But there was a regular series of toasts which, besides these voluntary ones, were always given at the refreshments of the brethren. Thus, when the reigning sovereign happened to be a member of the Fraternity, the first toast given was always "The King and the Craft."

In the French Lodges the drinking of toasts was, with the word itself, borrowed from England. It was, however, subjected to strict rules, from which there could be no departure. Seven toasts were called "Santés d' obligation," because drinking them was made obligatory, and could not be omitted at the Lodge banquet. They were as follows: 1. The health of the Sovereign and his family; 2. That of the Grand Master and the chiefs of the Order; 3. That of the Master of the Lodge; 4. That of the Wardens; 5. That of the other officers; 6. That of the visitors; 7. That of all Masons wheresoever spread over the two hemispheres. In 1872, the Grand Orient, after long discussions, reduced the number of santés d' obligation from seven to four, and changed their character. They are now: 1. To the Grand Orient of France, the Lodges of its correspondence, and foreign Grand Orients; 2. To the Master of the Lodge; 3. To the Wardens, the officers, affiliated Lodges, and visiting brethren; 4. To all Masons existing on each hemisphere.

The systematized method of drinking toasts, which once prevailed in the Lodges of the English-speaking countries, has been, to a great extent, abandoned; yet a few toasts still remain, which, although not absolutely obligatory, are still never omitted. Thus no Masonic Lodge would neglect at its banquet to offer, as its first toast, a sentiment expressive of respect for the Grand Lodge.

The venerable Oliver was a great admirer of the custom of drinking Masonic toasts, and panegyricizes it in his Book of the Lodge, (p. 147.) He says that at the time of refreshment in a Masonic Lodge "the song appeared to have more zest than in a private company; the toast thrilled more vividly upon the recollection; and the small modicum of punch with which it was honored retained a higher flavor than the same potation if produced at a private board." And he adds, as a specimen, the following "characteristic toast," which he says was always received with a "profound expression of pleasure."

"To him that all things understood,
To him that found the stone and wood,
To him that hapless lost his blood,
In doing of his duty,
To that blest age and that blest morn
Whereon those three great men were born,
Our noble science to adorn
With Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty."

It is not surprising that he should afterwards pathetically deplore the discontinuance of the custom.

Token. The word token is derived from the Anglo-Saxon tacn, which means a sign, presage, type, or representation, that which points out something; and this is traced to tecan, to teach, show, or instruct, because by a token we show or instruct others as to what we are. Bailey, whose Dictionary was published soon after the revival, defines it as "a sign or mark;" but it is singular that the word is not found in either of the dictionaries of Phillips or Blount, which were the most popular glossaries in the beginning of the last century. The word was, however, well known to the Fraternity, and was in use at the time of the revival with precisely the same meaning that is now given to it as a mode of recognition.

The Hebrew word אוֹת, oth, is frequently used in Scripture to signify a sign or memorial of something past, some covenant made or promise given. Thus God says to Noah, of the rainbow, "it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth;" and to Abraham he says of circumcision, "it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you." In Masonry, the grip of recognition is called a token, because it is an outward sign of the covenant of friendship and fellowship entered into between the members of the Fraternity, and is to be considered as a memorial of that covenant which was made, when it was first received by the candidate, between him and the Order into which he was then initiated.

Neither the French nor the German Masons have a word precisely equivalent to token. Krause translates it by merkmale, a sign or representation, but which has no technical Masonic signification. The French have only attouchement, which means the act of touching; and the Germans, griff, which is the same as the English grip. In the technical use of the word token, the English-speaking Masons have an advantage not possessed by those of any other country.

Tolerance Lodge. When the initiation of Jews was forbidden in the Prussian Lodges, two brethren of Berlin, Von Hirschfeld and Catter, induced by a spirit of toleration, organized a Lodge in Berlin for the express purpose of initiating Jews, to which they gave the appropriate name of Tolerance Lodge. This Lodge was not recognized by the Masonic authorities.

Toleration. The grand characteristic of Masonry is its toleration in religion and politics. In respect to the latter, its toleration has no limit. The question of a man's political opinions is not permitted to be broached in the Lodge; in reference to the former, it requires only that, to use the language of the old charge, Masons shall be of "that religion in which all men agree, leaving their particular opinions to themselves." The same old Charges say, "No private piques or quarrels must be brought within the door of the Lodge, far less any quarrels about religion, or nations, or state policy, we being only, as Masons, of the Catholic religion above-mentioned; we are also of all nations, tongues, kindreds, and languages, and are resolved against all politics, as what never yet conducted to the welfare of the Lodge, nor ever will."

Tomb of Adoniram. Margoliouth, in his History of the Jews, tells the legend that at Saguntum, in Spain, a sepulchre was found four hundred years ago, with the following Hebrew inscription: "This is the grave of Adoniram, the servant of King Solomon, who came to collect the tribute, and died on the day—" Margoliouth, who believes the mythical story, says that the Jesuit Villepandus, being desirous of ascertaining if the statements concerning the tomb were true, directed the Jesuit students who resided at Murviedro, a small village erected upon the ruins of Saguntum, to make diligent search for the tomb and inscription. After a thorough investigation, the Jesuit students were shown a stone on which appeared a Hebrew inscription, much defaced and nearly obliterated, which the natives stated was "the stone of Solomon's collector." Still unsatisfied, they made further search, and discovered a manuscript written in antique Spanish, and carefully preserved in the citadel, in which the following entry was made: "At Saguntum, in the citadel, in the year of our Lord 1480, a little more or less, was discovered a sepulchre of surprising antiquity. It contained an embalmed corpse, not of the usual stature, but taller than is common. It had and still retains on the front two lines in the Hebrew language and characters, the sense of which is: 'The sepulchre of Adoniram, the servant of King Solomon, who came hither to collect tribute.'"

The story has far more the appearance of a Talmudic or a Rosicrucian legend than that of a historical narrative.

Tomb of Hiram Abif. All that is said of it in Masonry is more properly referred to in the article on the Monument in the Third Degree. See Monument.

Tomb of Hiram of Tyre. Five miles to the east of the city of Tyre is an ancient monument, called by the natives Kabr Hairan, or the tomb of Hiram. The tradition that the king of Tyre was there interred rests only on the authority of the natives. It bears about it, however, the unmistakable marks of extreme antiquity, and, as Thompson says, (The Land and The Book, i. 290,) there is nothing in the monument itself inconsistent with the idea that it marks the final resting-place of that friend of Solomon. He thus describes it: "The base consists of two tiers of great stones, each three feet thick, thirteen feet long, and eight feet eight inches broad. Above this is one huge stone, a little more than fifteen feet long, ten broad, and three feet four inches thick. Over this is another, twelve feet three inches long, eight broad, and six high. The top stone is a little smaller every way, and only five feet thick. The entire height is twenty-one feet. There is nothing like it in this country, and it may well have stood, as it now does, ever since the days of Solomon. The large broken sarcophagi scattered around it are assigned by tradition to Hiram's mother, wife, or family."

Dr. Morris, who visited the spot in 1868, gives a different admeasurement, which is probably more accurate than that of Thompson. According to him, the first tier is 14 ft. long, 8 ft. 8 in. broad, 4 ft. thick. Second tier, 14 ft. long, 8 ft. 8 in. broad, 2 ft. 10 in. thick. Third tier, 15 ft. 1 in. long, 9 ft. 11 in. broad, 2 ft. 11 in. thick. Fourth tier, 12 ft. 11 in. long, 7 ft. 8 in. broad, 6 ft. 5 in. thick. Fifth tier, 12 ft. 11 in. long, 7 ft. 8 in. broad, and 3 ft. 6 in. thick. He makes the height of the whole 19 ft. 8 in.

Travellers have been disposed to give more credit to the tradition which makes this monument the tomb of the king of Tyre than to most of the other legends which refer to ancient sepulchres in the Holy Land.

Tongue. In the early rituals of the last century, the tongue is called the key to the secrets of a Mason; and one of the toasts that was given in the Lodge was in these words: "To that excellent key of a Mason's tongue, which ought always to speak as well in the absence of a brother as in his presence; and when that cannot be done with honor, justice, or propriety, that adopts the virtue of a Mason, which is silence."

Tongue, Instructive. See Instructive Tongue.

Tongue of Good Report. Being "under the tongue of good report" is equivalent, in Masonic technical language, to being of good character or reputation. It is required that the candidate for initiation should be one of whom no tongue speaks evil. The phrase is an old one, and is found in the earliest rituals of the last century.

Topaz. In Hebrew, פִּטְדָּה, piddah. It was the second stone in the first row of the high priest's breastplate, and was referred to Simeon. The ancient topaz, says King, (Antique Gems, p. 56,) was the present chrysolite, which was furnished from an island in the Red Sea. It is of a bright greenish yellow, and the softest of all precious stones.

Torches. The ancients made use of torches both at marriages and funerals. They were also employed in the ceremonies of the Eleusinian mysteries. They have been introduced into the high degrees, especially on the continent, principally as marks of honor in the reception of distinguished visitors, on which occasion they are technically called "stars." Du Cange mentions their use during the Middle Ages on funeral occasions.

Torgau, Constitutions of. Torgau is a fortified town on the Elbe, in the Prussian province of Saxony. It was there that Luther and his friends wrote the Book of Torgau, which was the foundation of the subsequent Augsburg Confession, and it was there that the Lutherans concluded a league with the Elector Frederick the Wise. The Stonemasons, whose seat was there in the fifteenth century, had, with the other Masons of Saxony, accepted the Constitutions enacted in 1459 at Strasburg. But, finding it necessary to make some special regulations for their own internal government, they drew up, in 1462, Constitutions in 112 articles, which are known as the "Constitutions of Torgau." A duplicate of these Constitutions was deposited, in 1486, in the Stonemason's hutte at Rochlitz. An authenticated copy of this document was published by C. L. Stieglitz at Leipsic, in 1829, in a work entitled Ueber die Kirche der heiligen Kunigunde zu Rochlitz und die Steinmetzhütte daselbst. An abstract of these Constitutions, with critical comparisons with other Constitutions, was published by Kloss in his Die Freimaurerei in ihrer wahren Bedeutung. The Constitutions of Torgau are important because, with those of Strasburg, they are the only authentic Constitutions of the German Stonemasons extant.

Torrubia, Joseph. A Franciscan monk, who in 1751 was the censor and reviser of the Inquisition in Spain. Torrubia, that he might be the better enabled to carry into effect a persecution of the Freemasons, obtained under an assumed name, and in the character of a secular priest, initiation into one of the Lodges, having first received from the Grand Penitentiary a dispensation for the act, and an absolution from the oath of secrecy. Having thus acquired an exact list of the Lodges in Spain, and the names of their members, he caused hundreds of Masons to be arrested and punished, and succeeded in having the Order prohibited by a decree of King Ferdinand VI. Torrubia combined in his character the bigotry of the priest and the villany of the traitor.

Tournon, M. A Frenchman and Freemason, who had been invited into Spain by the government in order to establish a manufactory of brass buttons, and to instruct the Spanish workmen. In 1757 he was arrested by the Inquisition on the charge of being a Freemason, and of having invited his pupils to join the Institution. He was sentenced to imprisonment for one year, after which he was banished from Spain, being conducted under an escort to the frontiers of France. Tournon was indebted for this clemency to his want of firmness and fidelity to the Order—he having solemnly abjured it, and promised never again to attend its assemblies. Llorente, in his History of the Inquisition, gives an account of Tournon's trial.

Town, Salem. The Rev. Salem Town, L.L.D., was born at Belchertown, in the State of Massachusetts, March 5, 1779. He received a classical education, and obtained at college the degree of Master of Arts, and later in life that of Doctor of Laws. For some years he was the Principal of an academy, and his writings give the evidence that he was endowed with more than ordinary abilities. He was ardently attached to Freemasonry, and was for many years Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter, and Grand Prelate of the Grand Commandery of New York. In 1818 he published a small work, of two hundred and eighty-three pages, entitled A System of Speculative Masonry. This work is of course tinged with all the legendary ideas of the origin of the Institution which prevailed at that period, and would not now be accepted as authoritative; but it contains, outside of its historical errors, many valuable and suggestive thoughts. Brother Town was highly respected for his many virtues, the consistency of his life, and his unwearied devotion to the Masonic Order. He died at Greencastle, Indiana, February 24, 1864, at the ripe age of eighty-nine years.

Townshend, Simeon. The putative author of a book entitled Observations and Inquiries relating to the Brotherhood of the Free Masons, which is said to have been printed at London in 1712. Boileau, Levesque, Thory, Oliver, and Kloss, mention it by name. None of them, however, appear to have seen it. Kloss calls it a doubtful book. If such a work is in existence, it will be a valuable and much needed contribution to the condition of Masonry in the south of England just before the revival, and may tend to settle some mooted questions. Levesque (Aperçu, p. 47,) says he has consulted it; but his manner of referring to it throws suspicion on the statement, and I doubt if he ever saw it.

Tradition. There are two kinds of traditions in Masonry: First, those which detail events, either historically, authentic in part, or in whole, or consisting altogether of arbitrary fiction, and intended simply to convey an allegorical or symbolic meaning; and secondly, of traditions which refer to customs and usages of the Fraternity, especially in matters of ritual observance.

The first class has already been discussed in this work in the article on Legends, to which the reader is referred. The second class is now to be considered.

The traditions which control and direct the usages of the Fraternity constitute its unwritten law, and are almost wholly applicable to its ritual, although they are sometimes of use in the interpretation of doubtful points in its written law. Between the written and the unwritten law, the latter is always paramount. This is evident from the definition of a tradition as it is given by the monk Vincent of Lerins: "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus traditum est;" i. e., tradition is that which has been handed down at all times, in all places, and by all persons. The law which thus has antiquity, universality, and common consent for its support, must override all subsequent laws which are modern, local, and have only partial agreement.

It is then important that those traditions of Masonry which prescribe its ritual observances and its landmarks should be thoroughly understood, because it is only by attention to them that uniformity in the esoteric instruction and work of the Order can be preserved.

Cicero has wisely said that a well-constituted commonwealth must be governed not by the written law alone, but also by the unwritten law or tradition and usage; and this is especially the case, because the written law, however perspicuous it may be, can be diverted into various senses, unless the republic is maintained and preserved by its usages and traditions, which, although mute and as it were dead, yet speak with a living voice, and give the true interpretation of that which is written.

This axiom is not less true in Masonry than it is in a commonwealth. No matter what changes may be made in its statutes and regulations of to-day and its recent customs, there is no danger of losing the identity of its modern with its ancient form and spirit while its traditions are recognized and maintained.

Tramping Masons. Unworthy members of the Order, who, using their privileges for interested purposes, travelling from city to city and from Lodge to Lodge, that they may seek relief by tales of fictitious distress, have been called "tramping Masons." The true brother should ever obtain assistance; the trampler should be driven from the door of every Lodge or the house of every Mason where he seeks to intrude his imposture.

Transfer of Warrant. When a Lodge has, by the misconduct of its members, rendered itself unworthy of longer possessing a Warrant, the modern Constitution of the Grand Lodge of England prescribes that the Grand Master may, after the Grand Lodge shall have decided on that fact, transfer such Warrant to other brethren whom he may think deserving, with a new number at the bottom of the Lodges then on record. No such power has been granted to the Grand Masters of this country. They may, indeed, arrest a Warrant—that is, suspend the labors of a Lodge until the next meeting of the Grand Lodge—but the power of forfeiture and transference of Warrants is vested only in Grand Lodges.

Transient Brethren. Masons who do not reside in a particular place, but only temporarily visit it, are called "transient brethren." They are, if worthy, to be cordially welcomed, but are never to be admitted into a Lodge until, after the proper precautions, they have been proved to be "true and trusty." This usage of hospitality has the authority of all the Old Constitutions, which are careful to inculcate it. Thus the Landsdowne MS. charges, "that every Mason receive or cherish Strange Fellows when they come over the country, and sett them on worke if they will worke, as the manner is, (that is to say) if the Mason have any moulde stone in his place, on worke; and if he have none, the Mason shall refresh him with money unto the next Lodge."

Although Speculative Masons no longer visit Lodges for the sake of work or wages, the usage of our Operative predecessors has been spiritualized in our symbolic system. Hence visitors are often invited to take a part in the labors of the Lodge, and receive their portion of the light and truth which constitute the symbolic pay of a Speculative Mason.

Transition Period. Findel calls that period in the history of Masonry, when it was gradually changing its character from that of an Operative to that of a Speculative society, "the Transition Period."

It began in 1600, and terminated in 1717 by the establishment of the Grand Lodge of England in London, after which, says Findel, (Hist., Lyon's trans., p. 131), "modern Freemasonry was to be taught as a spiritualizing art, and the Fraternity of Operative Masons was exalted to a Brotherhood of symbolic builders, who, in the place of visible, perishable temples, are engaged in the erection of that one, invisible, eternal temple of the heart and mind."

Transmission, Charter of. A deed said to have been granted by James de Molay, just before his death, to Mark Larmenius, by which he transmitted to him and to his successors the office of Grand Master of the Templars. It is the foundation deed of the "Order of the Temple." It is preserved in the treasury of the Order in Paris, and is written in Latin on a large folio sheet of parchment. The outward appearance of the document is of great antiquity, but it wants internal evidence of authenticity. It is therefore, by most authorities, considered a forgery. See Temple, Order of the.

Travel. In the symbolic language of Masonry, a Mason always travels from west to east in search of light—he travels from the lofty tower of Babel, where language was confounded and Masonry lost, to the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite, where language was restored and Masonry found. The Master Mason also travels into foreign countries in search of wages. All this is pure symbolism, unintelligible in any other sense. For its interpretation, see Foreign Countries and Threshing-Floor.

Travelling Freemasons. There is no portion of the history of the Order so interesting to the Masonic scholar as that which is embraced by the Middle Ages of Christendom, beginning with about the tenth century, when the whole of civilized Europe was perambulated by those associations of workmen, who passed from country to country and from city to city under the name of "Travelling Freemasons," for the purpose of erecting religious edifices. There is not a country of Europe which does not at this day contain honorable evidences of the skill and industry of our Masonic ancestors. I therefore propose, in the present article, to give a brief sketch of the origin, the progress, and the character of these travelling architects.

Mr. George Godwin, in a lecture published in the Builder, (vol. ix., p. 463,) says: "There are few points in the Middle Ages more pleasing to look back upon than the existence of the associated Masons; they are the bright spot in the general darkness of that period, the patch of verdure when all around is barren."

Clavel, in his Histoire Pittoresque de la Franco-Maçonnerie, has traced the organization of these associations to the "collegia artificum," or colleges of artisans, which were instituted at Rome, by Numa, in the year B. C. 714, and whose members were originally Greeks, imported by this lawgiver for the purpose of embellishing the city over which he reigned. They continued to exist as well-established corporations throughout all the succeeding years of the kingdom, the republic, and the empire. (See Roman Colleges of Artificers.)

These "sodalitates," or fraternities, began, upon the invasion of the barbarians, to decline in numbers, in respectability, and in power. But on the conversion of the whole empire, they, or others of a similar character, began again to flourish. The priests of the Christian Church became their patrons, and under their guidance they devoted themselves to the building of churches and monasteries. In the tenth century, they were established as a free gild or corporation in Lombardy. For when, after the decline and fall of the empire, the city of Rome was abandoned by its sovereigns for other secondary cities of Italy, such as Milan and Ravenna, and new courts and new capitals were formed, the kingdom of Lombardy sprang into existence as the great centre of all energy in trade and industry, and of refinement in art and literature. It was there, and as a consequence of the great centre of life from Rome, and the development not only of commercial business, but of all sorts of trades and handicrafts, that the corporations known as gilds were first organized.

Among the arts practised by the Lombards, that of building held a pre-eminent rank. And Muratori tells us that the inhabitants of Como, a principal city of Lombardy, Italy, had become so superior as masons, that the appellation of Magistri Comacini, or Masters from Como, had become generic to all of the profession.

Mr. Hope, in his Historical Essay on Architecture, has treated this subject almost exhaustively. He says:

"We cannot then wonder that, at a period when artificers and artists of every class, from those of the most mechanical, to those of the most intellectual nature, formed themselves into exclusive corporations, architects—whose art may be said to offer the most exact medium between those of the most urgent necessity, and those of mere ornament, or, indeed, in its wide span to embrace both—should, above all others, have associated themselves into similar bodies, which, in conformity to the general style of such corporations, assumed that of Free and Accepted Masons, and was composed of those members who, after a regular passage through the different fixed stages of apprenticeship, were received as masters, and entitled to exercise the profession on their own account.

"In an age, however, in which lay individuals, from the lowest subject to the sovereign himself, seldom built except for mere shelter and safety—seldom sought, nay, rather avoided, in their dwellings an elegance which might lessen their security; in which even the community collectively, in its public and general capacity, divided into component parts less numerous and less varied, required not those numerous public edifices which we possess either for business or pleasure; thus, when neither domestic nor civic architecture of any sort demanded great ability or afforded great employment, churches and monasteries were the only buildings required to combine extent and elegance, and sacred architecture alone could furnish an extensive field for the exercise of great skill, Lombardy itself, opulent and thriving as it was, compared to other countries, soon became nearly saturated with the requisite edifices, and unable to give these companies of Free and Accepted Masons a longer continuance of sufficient custom, or to render the further maintenance of their exclusive privileges of great benefit to them at home. But if, to the south of the Alps, an earlier civilization had at last caused the number of architects to exceed that of new buildings wanted, it fared otherwise in the north of Europe, where a gradually spreading Christianity began on every side to produce a want of sacred edifices, of churches and monasteries, to design which architects existed not on the spot.

"Those Italian corporations of builders, therefore, whose services ceased to be necessary in the countries where they had arisen, now began to look abroad towards those northern climes for that employment which they no longer found at home: and a certain number united and formed themselves into a single greater association, or fraternity, which proposed to seek for occupation beyond its native land; and in any ruder foreign region, however remote, where new religious edifices and skilful artists to erect them, were wanted to offer their services, and bend their steps to undertake the work."

From Lombardy they passed beyond the Alps into all the countries where Christianity, but recently established, required the erection of churches. The popes encouraged their designs, and more than one bull was dispatched, conferring on them privileges of the most extensive character. A monopoly was granted to them for the erection of all religious edifices; they were declared independent of the sovereigns in whose dominions they might be temporarily residing, and subject only to their own private laws; they were permitted to regulate the amount of their wages; were exempted from all kinds of taxation; and no Mason, not belonging to their association, was permitted to compete with or oppose them in the pursuit of employment. And in one of the papal decrees on the subject of these artisans, the supreme pontiff declares that these regulations have been made "after the example of Hiram, king of Tyre, when he sent artisans to King Solomon for the purpose of building the Temple of Jerusalem."

After filling the continent with cathedrals, parochial churches, and monasteries, and increasing their own numbers by accessions of new members from all the countries in which they had been laboring, they passed over into England, and there introduced their peculiar style of building. Thence they travelled to Scotland, and there have rendered their existence ever memorable by establishing, in the parish of Kilwinning, where they were erecting an abbey, the germ of Scottish Freemasonry, which has regularly descended through the Grand Lodge of Scotland to the present day.

Mr. Hope accounts for the introduction of non-working or unprofessional members into these associations by a theory which is confirmed by contemporary history. He says:

"Often obliged, from regions the most distant, singly to seek the common place of rendezvous and departure of the troop, or singly to follow its earlier detachments to places of employment equally distant; and that, at an era when travellers met on the road every obstruction, and no convenience, when no inns existed at which to purchase hospitality, but lords dwelt everywhere, who only prohibited their tenants from waylaying the traveller because they considered this, like killing game, one of their own exclusive privileges; the members of these communities contrived to render their journeys more easy and safe, by engaging with each other, and perhaps even, in many places, with individuals not directly participating in their profession, in compacts of mutual assistance, hospitality and good services, most valuable to men so circumstanced. They endeavored to compensate for the perils which attended their expeditions, by institutions for their needy or disabled brothers; but lest such as belonged not to their communities should benefit surreptitiously by these arrangements for its advantage, they framed signs of mutual recognition, as carefully concealed from the knowledge of the uninitiated, as the mysteries of their art themselves. Thus supplied with whatever could facilitate such distant journeys and labors as they contemplated, the members of these corporations were ready to obey any summons with the utmost alacrity, and they soon received the encouragement they anticipated. The militia of the church of Rome, which diffused itself all over Europe in the shape of missionaries, to instruct nations, and to establish their allegiance to the Pope, took care not only to make them feel the want of churches and monasteries, but likewise to learn the manner in which the want might be supplied. Indeed, they themselves generally undertook the supply; and it may be asserted, that a new apostle of the Gospel no sooner arrived in the remotest corner of Europe, either to convert the inhabitants to Christianity, or to introduce among them a new religious order, than speedily followed a tribe of itinerant Freemasons to back him, and to provide the inhabitants with the necessary places of worship or reception.

"Thus ushered in, by their interior arrangements assured of assistance and of safety on the road, and, by the bulls of the Pope and the support of his ministers abroad, of every species of immunity and preference at the place of their destination, bodies of Freemasons dispersed themselves in every direction, every day began to advance further, and to proceed from country to country, to the utmost verge of the faithful, in order to answer the increasing demand for them, or to seek more distant custom."

The government of these fraternities, wherever they might be for the time located, was very regular and uniform. When about to commence the erection of a religious edifice, they first built huts, or, as they were termed, lodges, in the vicinity, in which they resided for the sake of economy as well as convenience. It is from these that the present name of our places of meeting is derived. Over every ten men was placed a warden, who paid them wages, and took care that there should be no needless expenditure of materials and no careless loss of implements. Over the whole, a surveyor or master, called in their old documents "magister," presided, and directed the general labor.

The Abbé Grandidier, in a letter at the end of the Marquis Luchet's Essai sur les Illuminés, has quoted from the ancient register of the Masons at Strasburg the regulations of the association which built the splendid cathedral of that city. Its great rarity renders it difficult to obtain a sight of the original work, but the Histoire Pittoresque of Clavel supplies the most prominent details of all that Grandidier has preserved. The cathedral of Strasburg was commenced in the year 1277, under the direction of Erwin of Steinbach. The Masons who, under his directions, were engaged in the construction of this noblest specimen of the Gothic style of architecture, were divided into the separate ranks of Masters, Craftsmen, and Apprentices. The place where they assembled was called a "hutte," a German word equivalent to our English term lodge. They employed the implements of masonry as emblems, and wore them as insignia. They had certain signs and words of recognition, and received their new members with peculiar and secret ceremonies, admitting, as has already been said, many eminent persons, and especially ecclesiastics, who were not Operative Masons, but who gave to them their patronage and protection.

The fraternity of Strasburg became celebrated throughout Germany, their superiority was acknowledged by the kindred associations, and they in time received the appellation of the "haupt hutte," or Grand Lodge, and exercised supremacy over the huten of Suabia, Hesse, Bavaria, Franconia, Saxony, Thuringia, and the countries bordering on the river Moselle. The Masters of these several Lodges assembled at Ratisbon in 1459, and on the 25th of April contracted an act of union, declaring the chief of the Strasburg Cathedral the only and perpetual Grand Master of the General Fraternity of Freemasons of Germany. This act of union was definitively adopted and promulgated at a meeting held soon afterwards at Strasburg.

Similar institutions existed in France and in Switzerland, for wherever Christianity had penetrated, there churches and cathedrals were to be built, and the Travelling Freemasons hastened to undertake the labor.

They entered England and Scotland at an early period. Whatever may be thought of the authenticity of the York and Kilwinning legends, there is ample evidence of the existence of organized associations, gilds, or corporations of Operative Masons at an epoch not long after their departure from Lombardy. From that period, the fraternity, with various intermissions, continued to pursue their labors, and constructed many edifices which still remain as monuments of their skill as workmen and their taste as architects. Kings, in many instances, became their patrons, and their labors were superintended by powerful noblemen and eminent prelates, who, for this purpose, were admitted as members of the fraternity. Many of the old Charges for the better government of their Lodges have been preserved, and are still to be found in our Books of Constitutions, every line of which indicates that they were originally drawn up for associations strictly and exclusively operative in their character.

In glancing over the history of this singular body of architects, we are struck with several important peculiarities.

In the first place, they were strictly ecclesiastical in their constitution. The Pope, the supreme pontiff of the Church, was their patron and protector. They were supported and encouraged by bishops and abbots, and hence their chief employment appears to have been in the construction of religious edifices. Like their ancestors, who were engaged in the erection of the magnificent Temple of Jerusalem, they devoted themselves to labor for the "House of the Lord." Masonry was then, as it had been before, and has ever been since, intimately connected with religion.

They were originally all operatives. But the artisans of that period were not educated men, and they were compelled to seek among the clergy, the only men of learning, for those whose wisdom might contrive, and whose cultivated taste might adorn, the plans which they, by their practical skill, were to carry into effect. Hence the germ of that Speculative Masonry which, once dividing the character of the fraternity with the Operative, now completely occupies it, to the entire exclusion of the latter.

But lastly, from the circumstance of their union and concert arose a uniformity of design in all the public buildings of that period — a uniformity so remarkable as to find its explanation only in the fact, that their construction was committed throughout the whole of Europe, if not always to the same individuals, at least to members of the same association. The remarks of Mr. Hope on this subject are well worthy of perusal. "The architects of all the sacred edifices of the Latin church, wherever such arose, — north, south, east, or west, — thus derived their science from the same central school; obeyed in their designs the same hierarchy; were directed in their constructions by the same principles of propriety and taste; kept up with each other, in the most distant parts to which they might be sent, the most constant correspondence; and rendered every minute improvement the property of the whole body and a new conquest of the art. The result of this unanimity was, that at each successive period of the monastic dynasty, on whatever point a new church or new monastery might be erected, it resembled all those raised at the same period in every other place, however distant from it, as if both had been built in the same place by the same artist. For instance, we find, at particular epochs, churches as far distant from each other as the north of Scotland and the south of Italy, to be minutely similar in all the essential characteristics."

In conclusion, we may remark, that the world is indebted to this association for the introduction of the Gothic, or, as it has lately been denominated, the pointed style of architecture. This style—so different from the Greek or Roman orders, whose pointed arches and minute tracery distinguish the solemn temples of the olden time, and whose ruins arrest the attention and claim the admiration of the spectator—has been universally acknowledged to be the invention of the Travelling Freemasons of the Middle Ages.

And it is to this association of Operative artists that, by gradual changes into a speculative system, we are to trace the Freemasons of the present day.

Travelling Warrants. Warrants under which military Lodges are organized, and so called because the Lodges which act under them are permitted to travel from place to place with the regiments to which they are attached. See Military Lodges.

Travenol, Louis. A zealous and devoted French Mason of much ability, who wrote several Masonic works, which were published under the assumed name of Leonard Gabanon. The most valuable of his productions is one entitled, Catechisme des Francs-Maçons, précédé d'un Abrégé de l'Histoire d'Adoram, etc., published at Paris in 1743.

Treasure, Incomparable. This was a phrase of mystical import with the alchemists and hermetic philosophers. Pernetty (Dictionnaire Mytho-Hermétique) thus defines it. "The incomparable treasure is the powder of projection, the source of all that is good, since it procures unbounded riches, and a long life, without infirmities, to enjoy them." The "powder of projection" was the instrument by which they expected to attain to the full perfection of their work. What was this incomparable treasure was the great secret of the hermetic philosophers. They concealed the true object of their art under a symbolic language. "Believest thou, O fool," says Artephius, one of them, "that we plainly teach this secret of secrets, taking our words according to their literal signification?" But we do know that it was not, as the world supposed, the transmutation of metals, or the discovery of an elixir of life, but the acquisition of divine truth.

Many of the high degrees which were fabricated in the last century were founded on the hermetic philosophy; and they, too, borrowed from it the idea of an incomparable treasure. Thus in the ultimate degree of the Council of Emperors of the East and West, which degree became afterwards the Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret of the Scottish Rite, we find this very expression. In the old French rituals we meet with this sentence: "Let us now offer to the invincible Xerxes our sacred incomparable treasure, and we shall succeed victoriously." And out of the initial letters of the words of this sentence in the original French they fabricated the three most important words of the degree.

This "incomparable treasure" is to the Masons precisely what it was to the hermetic philosophers—Divine Truth. "As for the Treasure," says one of these books, (the Lumen de Lumine, cited by Hitchcock,) "it is not yet discovered, but it is very near."

Treasurer. An officer, found in all Masonic bodies, whose duty it is to take charge of the funds and pay them out under proper regulations. He is simply the banker of the Lodge or Chapter, and has nothing to do with the collection of money, which should be made by the Secretary. He is an elective officer. The Treasurer's jewel is a key, as a symbol that he controls the chest of the Lodge. His position in the Lodge is on the right of the Worshipful Master, in front.

Treasurer, Grand. See Grand Treasurer.

Treasurer, Hermetic. (Trésorier hermétique.) A degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret. This collection contains eight other degrees with a similar title, namely: Illustrious Treasurer, Treasurer of Paracelsus, Treasurer of Solomon, Treasurer of the Masonic Mysteries, Treasurer of the Number 7, Sublime Treasurer, Depositor of the Key of the Grand Work, and, lastly, one with the grandiloquent title of Grand and Sublime Treasurer, or Depositor of the Great Solomon, Faithful Guardian of Jehovah.

Trestle-Board. The trestle-board is defined to be the board upon which the Master inscribes the designs by which the Craft are to be directed in their labors. The French and German Masons have con-founded the trestle-board with the tracing-board; and Dr. Oliver (Landm., i. 132,) has not avoided the error. The two things are entirely different. The trestle is a framework for a table—in Scotch, trest; the trestle-board is the board placed for convenience of drawing on that frame. It contains nothing but a few diagrams, usually geometrical figures. The tracing-board is a picture formerly drawn on the floor of the Lodge, whence it was called a floor-cloth or carpet. It contains a delineation of the symbols of the degree to which it belongs. The trestle-board is to be found only in the Entered Apprentice's degree. There is a tracing-board in every degree, from the first to the highest. And, lastly, the trestle-board is a symbol; the tracing-board is a piece of furniture or picture containing the representation of many symbols.

It is probable that the trestle-board, from its necessary use in Operative Masonry, was one of the earliest symbols introduced into the Speculative system. It is not, however, mentioned in the Grand Mystery, published in 1724. But Prichard, who wrote only six years afterwards, describes it, under the corrupted name of trasel-board, as one of the immovable jewels of an Apprentice's Lodge. Browne, in 1800, following Preston, fell into the error of calling it a tracing-board, and gives from the Prestonian lecture what he terms "a beautiful degree of comparison," in which the Bible is compared to a tracing-board. But the Bible is not a collection of symbols, which a tracing-board is, but a trestle-board that contains the plan for the construction of a spiritual temple. Webb, however, when he arranged his system of lectures, took the proper view, and restored the true word, trestle-board.

Notwithstanding these changes in the name, trestle-board, trasel-board, tracing-board, and trestle-board again, the definition has continued from the earliest part of the last century to the present day the same. It has always been enumerated among the jewels of the Lodge, although the English system says that it is immovable and the American movable; and it has always been defined as "a board for the master workman to draw his designs upon."

In Operative Masonry, the trestle-board is of vast importance. It was on such an implement that the genius of the ancient masters worked out those problems of architecture that have reflected an unfading lustre on their skill. The trestle-board was the cradle that nursed the infancy of such mighty monuments as the cathedrals of Strasburg and Cologne; and as they advanced in stature, the trestle-board became the guardian spirit that directed their growth. Often have those old builders pondered by the midnight lamp upon their trestle-board, working out its designs with consummate taste and knowledge, — here springing an arch, and turning an angle there, until the embryo edifice stood forth in all the wisdom, strength, and beauty of the Master's art.

What, then, is its true symbolism in Speculative Masonry?

To construct his earthly temple, the Operative Mason followed the architectural designs laid down on the trestle-board, or book of plans of the architect. By these he hewed and squared his materials; by these he raised his walls; by these he constructed his arches; and by these strength and durability, combined with grace and beauty, were bestowed upon the edifice which he was constructing.

In the Masonic ritual, the Speculative Mason is reminded that, as the Operative artist erects his temporal building in accordance with the rules and designs laid down on the trestle-board of the master workman, so should he erect that spiritual building, of which the material is a type, in obedience to the rules and designs, the precepts and commands, laid down by the Grand Architect of the Universe in those great books of nature and revelation which constitute the spiritual trestle-board of every Freemason.

The trestle-board is then the symbol of the natural and moral law. Like every other symbol of the Order, it is universal and tolerant in its application; and while, as Christian Masons, we cling with unfaltering integrity to the explanation which makes the Scriptures of both dispensations our trestle-board, we permit our Jewish and Mohammedan brethren to content themselves with the books of the Old Testament or Koran. Masonry does not interfere with the peculiar form or development of any one's religious faith. All that it asks is that the interpretation of the symbol shall be according to what each one supposes to be the revealed will of his Creator. But so rigidly exacting is it that the symbol shall be preserved and, in some rational way, interpreted, that it peremptorily excludes the atheist from its communion, because, believing in no Supreme Being — no Divine Architect — he must necessarily be without a spiritual trestle-board on which the designs of that Being may be inscribed for his direction.

Triad. In all the ancient mythologies there were triads, which consisted of a mysterious union of three deities. Each triad was generally explained as consisting of a creator, a preserver, and a destroyer. The principal heathen triads were as follows: the Egyptian, Osiris, Isis, and Horus; the Orphic, Phanes, Uranus, and Kronos; the Zoroastrian, Ormuzd, Mithras, and Ahriman; the Indian, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; the Cabiric, Axercos, Axiokersa, and Axiokersos; the Phœnician, Ashtaroth, Milcom, and Chemosh; the Tyrian, Belus, Venus, and Thammuz; the Grecian, Zeus, Poseidon, and Hades; the Roman, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto; the Eleusinian, Iacchus, Persephone, and Demeter; the Platonic, Tagathon, Nous, and Psyche; the Celtic, Hu, Ceridwen, and Creirwy; the Teutonic, Fenris, Midgard, and Hela; the Gothic, Woden, Friga, and Thor; and the Scandinavians, Odin, Vile, and Ve. Even the Mexicans had their triads, which were Vitzliputzli, Kaloc, and Tescalipuca.

This system of triads has, indeed, been so predominant in all the old religions, as to be invested with a mystical idea; and hence it has become the type in Masonry of the triad of three governing officers, who are to be found in almost every degree. The Master and the two Wardens in the Lodge give rise to the Priest, the King, and the Scribe in the Royal Arch; to the Commander, the Generalissimo, and the Captain General in Templarism; and in most of the high degrees to a triad of three who preside under various names.

We must, perhaps, look for the origin of the triads in mythology, as we certainly must in Masonry, to the three positions and functions of the sun. The rising sun or creator of light, the meridian sun or its preserver, and the setting sun or its destroyer.

Triad Society of China. The San Hop Hwai, or Triad Society, is a secret political association in China, which has been mistaken by some writers for a species of Chinese Freemasonry; but it has in reality no connection whatsoever with the Masonic Order. In its principles, which are far from innocent, it is entirely antagonistic to Freemasonry. The Deputy Provincial Grand Master of British Masonry in China made a statement to this effect in 1855, in Notes and Queries, 1st Ser., vol. xii., p. 233.

Trials, Masonic. As the only object of a trial should be to seek the truth and fairly to administer justice, in a Masonic trial, especially, no recourse should ever be had to legal technicalities, whose use in ordinary courts appears simply to be to afford a means of escape for the guilty.

Masonic trials are, therefore, to be conducted in the simplest and least technical method, that will preserve at once the rights of the Order and of the accused, and which will enable the Lodge to obtain a thorough knowledge of all the facts in the case. The rules to be observed in conducting such trials have been already laid down by me in my Text Book of Jurisprudence, (pp. 558-564,) and I shall refer to them in the present article. They are as follows:

1. The preliminary step in every trial is the accusation or charge. The charge should always be made in writing, signed by the accuser, delivered to the Secretary, and read by that officer at the next regular communication of the Lodge. The accused should then be furnished with an attested copy of the charge, and be at the same time informed of the time and place appointed by the Lodge for the trial.

Any Master Mason may be the accuser of another, but a profane cannot be permitted to prefer charges against a Mason. Yet, if circumstances are known to a profane upon which charges ought to be predicated, a Master Mason may avail himself of that information, and out of it frame an accusation, to be presented to the Lodge. And such accusation will be received and investigated, although remotely derived from one who is not a member of the Order.

It is not necessary that the accuser should be a member of the same Lodge. It is sufficient if he is an affiliated Mason. I say an affiliated Mason; for it is generally held, and I believe correctly, that an unaffiliated Mason is no more competent to prefer charges than a profane.

2. If the accused is living beyond the geographical jurisdiction of the Lodge, the charges should be communicated to him by means of a letter through the post-office, and a reasonable time should be allowed for his answer, before the Lodge proceeds to trial. But if his residence be unknown, or if it be impossible to hold communication with him, the Lodge may then proceed to trial—care being had that no undue advantage be taken of his absence, and that the investigation be as full and impartial as the nature of the circumstances will permit.

3. The trial must commence at a regular communication, for reasons which have already been stated; but having commenced, it may be continued at special communications, called for that purpose; for, if it was allowed only to be continued at regular meetings, which take place but once a month, the long duration of time occupied would materially tend to defeat the ends of justice.

4. The Lodge must be opened in the highest degree to which the accuser has attained, and the examinations of all witnesses must take place in the presence of the accused and the accuser, if they desire it. It is competent for the accused to employ counsel for the better protection of his interests, provided such counsel is a Master Mason. But if the counsel be a member of the Lodge, he forfeits, by his professional advocacy of the accused, the right to vote at the final decision of the question.

5. The final decision of the charge, and the rendering of the verdict, whatever be the rank of the accused, must always be made in a Lodge opened on the third degree; and at the time of such decision, both the accuser and the accused, as well as his counsel, if he have any, should withdraw from the Lodge.

6. It is a general and an excellent rule, that no visitors shall be permitted to be present during a trial.

7. The testimony of Master Masons is usually taken on their honor, as such. That of others should be by affidavit, or in such other manner as both the accuser and accused may agree upon.

8. The testimony of profanes, or of those who are of a lower degree than the accused, is to be taken by a committee and reported to the Lodge, or, if convenient, by the whole Lodge, when closed and sitting as a committee. But both the accused and the accuser have a right to be present on such occasions.

9. When the trial is concluded, the accuser and the accused must retire, and the Master will then put the question of guilty, or not guilty, to the Lodge.

Not less than two-thirds of the votes should be required to declare the accused guilty. A bare majority is hardly sufficient to divest a brother of his good character, and render him subject to what may perhaps be an ignominious punishment. But on this subject the authorities differ.

10. If the verdict is guilty, the Master must then put the question as to the nature and extent of the punishment to be inflicted, beginning with expulsion and proceeding, if necessary, to indefinite suspension and public and private reprimand. To inflict expulsion or suspension, a vote of two-thirds of those present is required, but for a mere reprimand, a majority will be sufficient. The votes on the nature of the punishment should be viva voce, or, rather, according to Masonic usage, by a show of hands.

Trials in a Grand Lodge are to be conducted on the same general principles; but here, in consequence of the largeness of the body, and the inconvenience which would result from holding the examinations in open Lodge, and in the presence of all the members, it is more usual to appoint a committee, before whom the case is tried, and upon whose full report of the testimony the Grand Lodge bases its action. And the forms of trial in such committees must conform, in all respects, to the general usage already detailed.

Triangle. There is no symbol more important in its signification, more various in its application, or more generally diffused throughout the whole system of Freemasonry, than the triangle. An examination of it, therefore, cannot fail to be interesting to the Masonic student.

The equilateral triangle appears to have been adopted by nearly all the nations of antiquity as a symbol of the Deity, in some of his forms or emanations, and hence, probably, the prevailing influence of this symbol was carried into the Jewish system, where the yod within the triangle was made to represent the Tetragrammaton, or sacred name of God.

The equilateral triangle, says Bro. D. W. Nash, (Freem. Mag., iv. 294,) "viewed in the light of the doctrines of those who gave it currency as a divine symbol, represents the Great First Cause, the creator and container of all things, as one and indivisible, manifesting himself in an infinity of forms and attributes in this visible universe."

Among the Egyptians, the darkness through which the candidate for initiation was made to pass was symbolized by the trowel, an important Masonic implement, which in their system of hieroglyphics has the form of a triangle. The equilateral triangle they considered as the most perfect of figures, and a representative of the great principle of animated existence, each of its sides referring to one of the three departments of creation, the animal, vegetable, and mineral.

The equilateral triangle is to be found scattered throughout the Masonic system. It forms in the Royal Arch the figure within which the jewels of the officers are suspended. It is in the ineffable degrees the sacred delta, everywhere presenting itself as the symbol of the Grand Architect of the Universe. In Ancient Craft Masonry, it is constantly exhibited as the element of important ceremonies. The seats of the principal officers are arranged in a triangular form, the three lesser lights have the same situation, and the square and compass form, by their union on the greater light, two triangles meeting at their bases. In short, the equilateral triangle may be considered as one of the most constant forms of Masonic symbolism.

The right-angled triangle is another form of this figure which is deserving of attention. Among the Egyptians, it was the symbol of universal nature; the base representing Osiris, or the male principle; the perpendicular, Isis, or the female principle; and the hypotenuse, Horus, their son, or the product of the male and female principle.

This symbol was received by Pythagoras from the Egyptians during his long sojourn in that country, and with it he also learned the peculiar property it possessed, namely, that the sum of the squares of the two shorter sides is equal to the square of the longest side—symbolically expressed by the formula, that the product of Osiris and Isis is Horus. This figure has been adopted in the third degree of Masonry, and will be there recognized as the forty-seventh problem of Euclid.

Triangle, Double. See Seal of Solomon and Shield of David.

Triangle of Pythagoras. See Pentalpha.

Triangle, Radiated. A triangle placed within and surrounded by a circle of rays. This circle is called, in Christian art, "a glory." When this glory is distinct from the triangle, and surrounds it in the form of a circle, it is then an emblem of God's eternal glory. This is the usual form in religious uses. But when, as is most usual in the Masonic symbol, the rays emanate from the centre of the triangle, and, as it were, enshroud it in their brilliancy, it is symbolic of the Divine Light. The perverted ideas of the Pagans referred these rays of light to their sun-god and their Sabian worship.

But the true Masonic idea of this glory is, that it symbolizes that Eternal Light of Wisdom which surrounds the Supreme Architect as a sea of glory, and from him as a common centre emanates to the universe of his creation.

Triangle, Triple. The pentalpha, or triangle of Pythagoras, is usually called also the triple triangle, because three triangles are formed by the intersection of its sides. But there is another variety of the triple triangle which is more properly entitled to the appellation, and which is made in the annexed form.

It will be familiar to the Knight Templar as the form of the jewel worn by the Prelate of his Order. Like every modification of the triangle, it is a symbol of the Deity; but as the degree of Knight Templar appertains exclusively to Christian Masonry, the triple triangle there alludes to the mystery of the Trinity. In the Scottish Rite degree of Knight of the East the symbol is also said to refer to the triple essence of Deity; but the symbolism is made still more mystical by supposing that it represents the sacred number 81, each side of the three triangles being equivalent to 9, which again is the square of 3, the most sacred number in Freemasonry. In the twentieth degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, or that of "Grand Master of all Symbolic Lodges," it is said that the number 81 refers to the triple covenant of God, symbolized by a triple triangle said to have been seen by Solomon when he consecrated the Temple. Indeed, throughout the ineffable and the philosophic degrees, the allusions to the triple triangle are much more frequent than they are in Ancient Craft Masonry.

The Indian trimourti, or triple triangle of the Hindus, is of a different form, consisting of three concentric triangles. In the centre is the sacred trilateral name, AUM. The interior triangle symbolizes Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; the middle one, Creation, Preservation, and Destruction; and the exterior one, Earth, Water, and Air.

Tribe of Judah, Lion of the.

The connection of Solomon, as the chief of the tribe of Judah, with the lion, which was the achievement of the tribe, has caused this expression to be referred, in the third degree, to him who brought light and immortality to light. The old Christian interpretation of the Masonic symbols here prevails; and in Ancient Craft Masonry all allusions to the lion, as the lion's paw, the lion's grip, etc., refer to the doctrine of the resurrection taught by him who is known as "the lion of the tribe of Judah." The expression is borrowed from the Apocalypse, (v. 5:) "Behold, the Lion which is of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof." The lion was also a mediæval symbol of the resurrection, the idea being founded on a legend. The poets of that age were fond of referring to this legendary symbol in connection with the scriptural idea of the "tribe of Judah." Thus Adam de St. Victor, in his poem De Resurrectione Domini, says:

"Sic de Juda Leo fortis,
Fractis portis diræ mortis
Die surgit tertia, Rugiente voce Patris."

i. e.,

Thus the strong lion of Judah,
The gates of cruel death being broken,
Arose on the third day
At the loud-sounding voice of the Father.

The lion was the symbol of strength and sovereignty, in the human-headed figures of the Nimrod gateway, and in other Babylonish remains. In Egypt, it was worshipped at the city of Leontopolis as typical of Dom, the Egyptian Hercules. Plutarch says that the Egyptians ornamented their temples with gaping lions' mouths, because the Nile began to rise when the sun was in the constellation Leo. Among the Talmudists there was a tradition of the lion, which has been introduced into the higher degrees of Masonry.

But in the symbolism of Ancient Craft Masonry, where the lion is introduced, as in the third degree, in connection with the "lion of the tribe of Judah," he becomes simply a symbol of the resurrection; thus restoring the symbology of the mediæval ages, which was founded on a legend that the lion's whelp was born dead, and only brought to life by the roaring of its sire. Philip de Thaurin, in his Bestiary, written in the twelfth century, gives the legend, which has thus been translated by Mr. Wright from the original old Norman French:

"Know that the lioness, if she bring forth a dead cub, she holds her cub and the lion arrives; he goes about and cries, till it revives on the third day . . . Know that the lioness signifies St. Mary, and the lion Christ, who gave himself to death for the people; three days he lay in the earth to gain our souls. . . . By the cry of the lion they understand the power of God, by which Christ was restored to life and robbed hell."

The phrase, "lion of the tribe of Judah," therefore, when used in the Masonic ritual, referred in its original interpretation to Christ, him who "brought life and immortality to light."

Tribes of Israel. All the twelve tribes of Israel were engaged in the construction of the first Temple. But long before its destruction, ten of them revolted, and formed the nation of Israel; while the remaining two, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, retained possession of the Temple and of Jerusalem under the name of the kingdom of Judah. To these two tribes alone, after the return from the captivity, was intrusted the building of the second Temple. Hence in the high degrees, which, of course, are connected for the most part with the Temple of Zerubbabel, or with events that occurred subsequent to the destruction of that of Solomon, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin only are referred to. But in the primary degrees, which are based on the first Temple, the Masonic references always are to the twelve tribes. Hence in the old lectures the twelve original points are explained by a reference to the twelve tribes. See Twelve Original Points of Masonry.

Tribunal. The modern statutes of the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States direct trials of Masonic offences, committed by any brethren of the Rite above the 18th degree, to be held in a court called a Tribunal of the Thirty-First degree, to be composed of not less nor more than nine members. An appeal lies from such a Tribunal of Inspectors Inquisitors to the Grand Consistory or the Supreme Council.

Tribunal, Supreme. 1. The seventy-first degree of the Rite of Mizraim. 2. The meeting of Inquisitors Inspectors of the thirty-first degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite according to the modern ritual of the Mother Council.

Triliteral Name. The sacred name of God among the Hindus is so called because it consists of the three letters, A U M. See Aum.

Trinidad. Masonry was introduced into the island of Trinidad by the establishment of a Lodge called "Les Frères Unis," under a Charter from the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, in 1797. A Charter had been granted the year before by the Grand Orient of France, but never acted on, in consequence of the suspension of that body by the French Revolution. In 1804, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, in its caputular capacity, granted a Charter for a Royal Arch Chapter, which continued to meet until 1813, when it obtained a new Warrant of Constitution from the Supreme Chapter of Scotland. In 1814, Templar Masonry was established by a Deuchar Warrant from the Grand Conclave of Scotland. In 1819, a Council of Royal and Select Masters was established. Trinidad has at present a Provincial Grand Lodge under the Grand Lodge of Scotland, and there are also several Lodges under the Grand Lodge of England.

Trinosophs. The Lodge of the Trinosophs was instituted at Paris by the celebrated Ragon, October 15, 1816, and installed by the Grand Orient, January 11, 1817. The word Trinosophs is derived from the Greek, and signifies students of three sciences, in allusion to the three primitive degrees, which were the especial object of study by the members; although they adopted both the French and Scottish Rites, to whose high degrees, however, they gave their own philosophical interpretation. It was before this Lodge that Ragon delivered his Interpretative and Philosophic Course of Initiations. The Lodge was composed of some of the most learned Masons of France, and played an important part in Masonic literature. No Lodge in France has obtained so much celebrity as did the Trinosophs. It was connected with a Chapter and Council in which the high degrees were conferred, but the Lodge confined itself to the three symbolic degrees, which it sought to preserve in the utmost purity.

Triple Alliance. An expression in the high degrees, which, having been translated from the French rituals, should have more properly been the triple covenant. It is represented by the triple triangle, and refers to the covenant of God with his people, that of King Solomon with Hiram of Tyre, and that which binds the fraternity of Masons.

Triple Tau. The tau cross, or cross of St. Anthony, is a cross in the form of a Greek T. The triple tau is a figure formed by three of these crosses meeting in a point, and therefore resembling a letter T resting on the traverse bar of an H. This emblem, placed in the centre of a triangle and circle—both emblems of the Deity—constitutes the jewel of the Royal Arch as practised in England, where it is so highly esteemed as to be called the "emblem of all emblems," and "the grand emblem of Royal Arch Masonry." It was adopted in the same form as the Royal Arch badge, by the General Grand Chapter of the United States in 1859; although it had previously been very generally recognized by American Masons. It is also found in the caputular Masonry of Scotland. (See Royal Arch Badge.)

The original signification of this emblem has been variously explained. Some suppose it to include the initials of the Temple of Jerusalem, T. H., Templum Hierosolymæ; others, that it is a symbol of the mystical union of the Father and Son, H signifying Jehovah, and T, or the cross, the Son. A writer in Moore's Magazine ingeniously supposes it to be a representation of three T squares, and that it alludes to the three jewels of the three ancient Grand Masters. It has also been said that it is the monogram of Hiram of Tyre; and others assert that it is only a modification of the Hebrew letter shin, שׁ, which was one of the Jewish abbreviations of the sacred name. Oliver thinks, from its connection with the circle and triangle in the Royal Arch jewel, that it was intended to typify the sacred name as the author of eternal life. The English Royal Arch lectures say that "by its intersection it forms a given number of angles that may be taken in five several combinations; and, reduced, their amount in right angles will be found equal to the five Platonic bodies which represent the four elements and the sphere of the Universe." Amid so many speculations, I need not hesitate to offer one of my own. The Prophet Ezekiel speaks of the tau or tau cross as the mark distinguishing those who were to be saved, on account of their sorrow for their sins, from those who, as idolaters, were to be slain. It was a mark or sign of favorable distinction; and with this allusion we may, therefore, suppose the triple tau to be used in the Royal Arch degree as a mark designating and separating those who know and worship the true name of God from those who are ignorant of that august mystery.

Trivium. See Quadrivium.

Trowel. An implement of Operative Masonry, which has been adopted by speculative Masons as the peculiar working-tool of the Master's degree. By this implement, and its use in Operative Masonry to spread the cement which binds all the parts of the building into one common mass, we are taught to spread the cement of affection and kindness, which unites all the members of the Masonic family, whosoever dispersed over the globe, into one companionship of Brotherly Love.

This implement is considered the appropriate working-tool of a Master Mason, because, in Operative Masonry, while the Apprentice is engaged in preparing the rude materials, which require only the gauge and gavel to give them their proper shape, the Fellow Craft places them in their proper position by means of the plumb, level, and square; but the Master Mason alone, having examined their correctness and proved them true and trusty, secures them permanently in their place by spreading, with the trowel, the cement that irrevocably binds them together.

The trowel has also been adopted as the jewel of the Select Master. But its uses in this degree are not symbolical. They are simply connected with the historical legend of the degree.

Trowel and Sword. When Nehemiah received from Artaxerxes Longimanus the appointment of Governor of Judea, and was permitted to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and to restore the city to its former fortified condition, he met with great opposition from the Persian satraps, who were envious of his favor with the king, and from the heathen inhabitants of Samaria, who were unwilling to see the city again assume its pristine importance. The former undertook to injure him with Artaxerxes by false reports of his seditious designs to restore the independent kingdom of Judea. The latter sought to obstruct the workmen of Nehemiah in their labors, and openly attacked them. Nehemiah took the most active measures to refute the insidious accusations of the first, and to repel the more open violence of the latter. Josephus says (Antiq., B. XI., ch. vi., §8,) that he gave orders that the builders should keep their ranks, and have their armor on while they were building; and, accordingly, the mason had his sword on as well as he that brought the materials for building.

Zerubbabel had met with similar opposition from the Samaritans while rebuilding the Temple; and although the events connected with Nehemiah's restoration of the walls occurred long after the completion of the second Temple, yet the Masons have in the high degrees referred them to the time of Zerubbabel. Hence in the fifteenth degree of the Scottish Rite, or the Knight of the East, which refers to the building of the Temple of Zerubbabel, we find this combination of the trowel and the sword adopted as a symbol. The old ritual of that degree says that Zerubbabel, being informed of the hostile intentions of the false brethren from Samaria, "ordered that all the workmen should be armed with the trowel in one hand and the sword in the other, that while they worked with the one they might be enabled to defend themselves with the other, and ever repulse the enemy if they should dare to present themselves."

In reference to this idea, but not with chronological accuracy, the trowel and sword have been placed crosswise as symbols on the tracing-board of the English Royal Arch.

Oliver correctly interprets the symbol of the trowel and sword as signifying that, "next to obedience to lawful authority, a manly and determined resistance to lawless violence is an essential part of social duty."

Trowel, Society of the. Vasari, in his Lives of the Painters and Sculptors (life of G. F. Rustici), says that about the year 1512 there was established at Florence an association which counted among its members some of the most distinguished and learned inhabitants of the city. It was the "Società della Cucchiara," or the Society of the Trowel. Vasari adds that its symbols were the trowel, the hammer, the square, and the level, and had for its patron St. Andrew, which makes Reghellini think, rather illogically, that it had some relation to the Scottish Rite. Lenning, too, says that this society was the first appearance of Freemasonry in Florence. It is to be regretted that such misstatements of Masonic history should be encouraged by writers of learning and distinction. The perusal of the account of the formation of this society, as given by Vasari, shows that it had not the slightest connection with Freemasonry. It was simply a festive association, or dinner-club of Florentine artists; and it derived its title from the accidental circumstance that certain painters and sculptors, dining together in a garden, found not far from their table a mass of mortar, in which a trowel was sticking. Some rough jokes passed thereupon, in the casting of the mortar on each other, and the calling for the trowel to scrape it off. Whereupon they resolved to form an association to dine together annually, and, in memorial of the ludicrous event that had led to their establishment, they called themselves the Society of the Trowel.

True Masons. See Academy of True Masons.

Trust in God. Every candidate on his initiation is required to declare that his trust is in God. And so he who denies the existence of a Supreme Being is debarred the privilege of initiation, for atheism is a disqualification for Masonry. This pious principle has distinguished the Fraternity from the earliest period; and it is a happy coincidence, that the company of Operative Freemasons instituted in 1477 should have adopted, as their motto, the truly Masonic sentiment, "The Lord is all our Trust."

Truth. The real object of Freemasonry, in a philosophical and religious sense, is the search for truth. This truth is, therefore, symbolized by the WORD. From the first entrance of the Apprentice into the Lodge, until his reception of the highest degree, this search is continued. It is not always found, and a substitute must sometimes be provided. Yet whatever be the labors he may perform, whatever the ceremonies through which he may pass, whatever the symbols in which he may be instructed, whatever the reward he may obtain, the true end of all is the attainment of truth. This idea of truth is not the same as that expressed in the lecture of the first degree, where Brotherly Love, Relief, and Truth are there said to be the "three great tenets of a Mason's profession." In that connection, truth, which is called a "divine attribute, the foundation of every virtue," is synonymous with sincerity, honesty of expression, and plain dealing. The higher idea of truth which pervades the whole Masonic system, and which is symbolized by the WORD, is that which is properly expressed to a knowledge of God.

Tschoudy, Louis Theodore. Michaud spells the name Tschudi, but Lennings, Thory, Ragon, Oliver, and all other Masonic writers, give the name as Tschoudy, which form, therefore, I adopt as the most usual, if not the most correct, spelling.

The Baron de Tschoudy was born at Metz, in 1720. He was descended from a family originally of the Swiss canton of Glaris, but which had been established in France since the commencement of the sixteenth century. He was a counsellor of State and member of the Parliament of Metz; but the most important events of his life are those which connect him with the Masonic institution, of which he was a zealous and learned investigator. He was one of the most active apostles of the school of Ramsay, and adopted his theory of the Templar origin of Masonry. Having obtained permission from the king to travel, he went to Italy, in 1752, under the assumed name of the Chevalier de Lussy. There he excited the anger of the papal court by the publication at the Hague, in the same year, of a book entitled, Etrene au Pape, ou les Francs-Maçons Vengés; i. e., "A New Year's Gift for the Pope, or the Free Masons Avenged." This was a caustic commentary on the bull of Benedict XIV. excommunicating the Freemasons. It was followed, in the same year, by another work entitled, Le Vatican Vengé; i. e., "The Vatican Avenged;" an ironical apology, intended as a sequence to the former book. These two works subjected him to such persecution by the Church that he was soon compelled to seek safety in flight.

He next repaired to Russia, where his means of living became so much impaired that, Michaud says, he was compelled to enter the company of comedians of the Empress Elizabeth. From this condition he was relieved by Count Ivan Schouwalov, who made him his private secretary. He was also appointed the secretary of the Academy of Moscow, and governor of the pages at the court. But this advancement of his fortunes, and the fact of his being a Frenchman, created for him many enemies, and he was compelled at length to leave Russia and return to France. There, however, the persecutions of his enemies pursued him, and on his arrival at Paris he was sent to the Bastille. But the intercession of his mother with the Empress Elizabeth and with the Grand Duke Peter was successful, and he was speedily restored to liberty. He then retired to Metz, and for the rest of his life devoted himself to the task of Masonic reform and the fabrication of new systems.

In 1762, the Council of Knights of the East was established at Paris. Ragon says (Orthod. Maçon., p. 137,) that "its ritual was corrected by the Baron de Tschoudy, the author of the Blazing Star." But this is an error. Tschoudy was then at Metz, and his work and system of the Blazing Star did not appear until four years afterwards. It is at a later date that Tschoudy became connected with the Council.

In 1766 he published, in connection with Bardon-Duhamel, his most important work, entitled, L'Etoile Flamboyante, ou la Société des Francs-Maçons considérée sous tous les Aspects; i. e., "The Blazing Star, or the Society of Freemasons considered under every point of view."

In the same year he repaired to Paris, with the declared object of extending his Masonic system. He then attached himself to the Council of Knights of the East, which, under the guidance of the tailor Pirlet, had seceded from the Council of Emperors of the East and West. Tschoudy availed himself of the ignorance and of the boldness of Pirlet to put his plan of reform into execution by the creation of new degrees.

In Tschoudy's system, however, as developed in the L'Etoile Flamboyante, he does not show himself to be the advocate of the high degrees, which, he says, are "an occasion of expense to their dupes, and an abundant and lucrative resource for those who make a profitable traffic of their pretended instructions." He recognizes the three symbolic degrees because their gradations are necessary in the Lodge, which he viewed as a school; and to these he adds a superior class, which may be called the architects, or by any other name, provided we attach to it the proper meaning. All the high degrees he calls "Masonic reveries," excepting two, which he regards as containing the secret, the object, and the essence of Masonry, namely, the Scottish Knight of St. Andrew and the Knight of Palestine. The former of these degrees was composed by Tschoudy, and its ritual, which he bequeathed, with other manuscripts, to the Council of Knights of the East and West, was published in 1780, under the title of Ecossais de Saint André, contenant le développement total de l'art royal de la Franche-Maçonnerie. Subsequently, on the organization of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, the degree was adopted as the twenty-ninth of its series, and is considered as one of the most important and philosophic of the Scottish system. Its fabrication is, indeed, an evidence of the intellectual genius of its inventor.

Ragon, in his Orthodoxie Maçonnique, attributes to Tschoudy the fabrication of the Rite of Adonhiramite Masonry, and the authorship of the Recueil Précieux, which contains the description of the Rite. But the first edition of the Recueil, with the acknowledged authorship of Guillaume de St. Victor, appeared in 1781. This is probably about the date of the introduction of the Rite, and is just twelve years after Tschoudy had gone to his eternal rest.

Tschoudy also indulged in light literature, and several romances are attributed to him, the only one of which now known, entitled Thérèse Philosophe, does not add to his reputation.

Chemins Despontès (Encyc. Maçon., i. 143,) says: "The Baron Tschoudy, whose birth gave him a distinguished rank in society, left behind him the reputation of an excellent man, equally remarkable for his social virtues, his genius, and his military talents." Such appears to have been the general opinion of those who were his contemporaries or his immediate successors. He died at Paris, May 28, 1769.

Tuapholl. A term used by the Druids to designate an unhallowed circumambulation around the sacred cairn, or altar; the movement being against the sun, that is, from west to east by the north, the cairn being on the left hand of the circumambulator.

Tubal Cain. Of Tubal Cain, the sacred writings, as well as the Masonic legends, give us but scanty information. All that we hear of him in the book of Genesis is that he was the son of Lamech and Zillah, and was "an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." The Hebrew original does not justify the common version, for טבאל, lotesh, does not mean "an instructor," but "a sharpener,"—one who whets or sharpens instruments. Hence Dr. Raphall translates the passage as one "who sharpened various tools in copper and iron." The authorized version has, however, almost indelibly impressed the character of Tubal Cain as the father of artificers; and it is in this sense that he has been introduced from a very early period into the legendary history of Masonry.

The first Masonic reference to Tubal Cain is found in the "Legend of the Craft," where he is called "the founder of smithcraft." I cite this part of the legend from the Dowland MS. simply because of its more modern orthography; but the story is substantially the same in all the old manuscript Constitutions. In that Manuscript we find the following account of Tubal Cain:

"Before Noah's flood, there was a man called Lamech, as it is written in the Bible, in the fourth chapter of Genesis; and this Lamech had two wives, the one named Ada and the other named Zilla; by his first wife, Ada, he got two sons, the one Jubel, and the other Jubal: and by the other wife he got a son and a daughter. And these four children founded the beginning of all the sciences in the world. The elder son, Jabel, founded the science of geometry, and he carried flocks of sheep and lambs into the fields, and first built houses of stone and wood, as it is noted in the chapter above named. And his brother Jubal founded the science of music and songs of the tongue, the harp and organ. And the third brother, Tubal Cain, founded smithcraft, of gold, silver, copper, iron, and steel, and the daughter founded the art of weaving. And these children knew well that God would take vengeance for sin, either by fire or water, wherefore they wrote the sciences that they had found, on two pillars that they might be found after Noah's flood. The one pillar was marble, for that would not burn with fire; and the other was of brass, for that would not drown in water."

Similar to this is an old Rabbinical tradition, which asserts that Jubal, who was the inventor of writing as well as of music, having heard Adam say that the universe would be twice destroyed, once by fire and once by water, inquired which catastrophe would first occur; but Adam refusing to inform him, he inscribed the system of music which he had invented upon two pillars of stone and brick. A more modern Masonic tradition ascribes the construction of these pillars to Enoch.

To this account of Tubal Cain must be added the additional particulars, recorded by Josephus, that he exceeded all men in strength, and was renowned for his warlike achievements.

The only other account of the proto-metallurgist that we meet with in any ancient author is that which is contained in the celebrated fragment of Sanconiatho, who refers to him under the name of Chrysor, which is evidently, as Bochart affirms, a corruption of the Hebrew chores ur, a worker in fire, that is, a smith. Sanconiatho was a Phœnician author, who is supposed to have flourished before the Trojan war, probably, as Sir William Drummond suggests, about the time when Gideon was Judge of Israel, and who collected the different accounts and traditions of the origin of the world which were extant at the period in which he lived. A fragment only of this work has been preserved, which, translated into Greek by Philo Byblius, was inserted by Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica, and has thus been handed down to the present day. That portion of the history by Sanconiatho, which refers to Tubal Cain, is contained in the following words:

"A long time after the generation of Hypsoaranios, the inventors of hunting and fishing, Agreas and Alieas, were born; after whom the people were called hunters and fishers, and from whom sprang two brothers, who discovered iron, and the manner of working it. One of these two, called Chrysor, was skilled in eloquence, and composed verses and prophecies. He was the same with Hephaistos, and invented fishing-hooks, bait for taking fish, cordage and rafts, and was the first of all mankind who had navigated. He was therefore worshipped as a god after his death, and was called Diamichios. It is said that these brothers were the first who contrived partition walls of brick."

Hephaistos, it will be observed, is the Greek of the god who was called by the Romans Vulcan. Hence the remark of Sanconiatho, and the apparent similarity of names as well as occupations, have led some writers of the last, and even of the present, century to derive Vulcan from Tubal Cain by a process not very devious, and therefore familiar to etymologists. By the omission in Tubal Cain of the initial T, which is the Phœnician article, and its valueless vowel, we get Balcan, which, by the interchangeable nature of B and V, is easily transformed to Vulcan.

"That Tubal Cain," says Bishop Stillingfleet, (Orig. Sac., p. 292,) "gave first occasion to the name and worship of Vulcan, hath been very probably conceived, both from the very great affinity of the names, and that Tubal Cain is expressly mentioned to be an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron, and as near relation as Apollo had to Vulcan, Jubal had to Tubal Cain, who was the inventor of music, or the father of all such as handle the harp and organ, which the Greeks attribute to Apollo."

Vossius, in his treatise De Idolatria, (lib. i., cap. 36,) makes this derivation of Vulcan from Tubal Cain. But Bryant, in his Analysis of Ancient Mythology, (vol. i., p. 139,) denies the etymology, and says that among the Egyptians and Babylonians, Vulcan was equivalent to Orus or Osiris, symbols of the sun. He traces the name to the words Baal Cahen, Holy Bel, or sacred Lord. Bryant's etymology may be adopted, however, without any interference with the identity of Vulcan and Tubal Cain. He who discovered the uses of fire, may well, in the corruptions of idolatry, have typified the solar orb, the source of all heat. It might seem that Tubal is an attribute compounded of the definite particle T and the word Baal, signifying Lord. Tubal Cain would then signify "the Lord Cain." Again, dhu or du, in Arabic, signifies Lord; and we trace the same signification of this affix, in its various interchangeable forms of Du, Tu, and Di, in many Semitic words. But the question of the identical origin of Tubal Cain and Vulcan has at length been settled by the researches of comparative philologists. Tubal Cain is Semitic in origin, and Vulcan is Aryan. The latter may be traced to the Sanscrit ulka, a firebrand, from which we get also the Latin fulgur and fulmen, names of the lightning.

From the mention made of Tubal Cain in the "Legend of the Craft," the word was long ago adopted as significant in the primary degrees, and various attempts have been made to give it an interpretation.

Hutchinson, in an article in his Spirit of Masonry devoted to the consideration of the third degree, has the following reference to the word:

"The Mason advancing to this state of Masonry, pronounces his own sentence, as confessional of the imperfection of the second stage of his profession, and as probationary of the exalted degree to which he aspires, in the Greek distich, Τυμβονχοεω, (tumbonchoeo,) Struo tumulum: 'I prepare my sepulchre; I make my grave in the pollutions of the earth; I am under the shadow of death.' This distich has been vulgarly corrupted among us, and an expression takes place scarcely similar in sound, and entirely inconsistent with Masonry, and unmeaning in itself."

But however ingenious this interpretation of Hutchinson may be, it is generally admitted that it is incorrect.

The modern English Masons, and through them the French, have derived Tubal Cain from the Hebrew tebel, earth, and kanah, to acquire possession, and, with little respect for the grammatical rules of the Hebrew language, interpret it as meaning worldly possessions.

In the Hemming lectures, now the authorized English system, we find the answer to the question, "What does Tubal Cain denote?" is "Worldly possessions." And Delaunay, in his Thuilleur, (p. 17,) denies the reference to the proto-smith, and says: "If we reflect on the meaning of the two Hebrew words, we will easily recognize in their connection the secret wish of the hierophant, of the Templar, of the Freemason, and of every mystical sect, to govern the world in accordance with its own principles and its own laws." It is fortunate, I think, that the true meaning of the words will authorize no such interpretation. The fact is, that even if Tubal Cain were derived from tebel and kanah, the precise rules of Hebrew construction would forbid affixing to their union any such meaning as "worldly possessions." Such an interpretation of it in the French and English systems is, therefore, a very forced and inaccurate one.

The use of Tubal Cain as a significant word in the Masonic ritual is derived from the "Legend of the Craft," by which the name was made familiar to the Operative and then to the Speculative Masons; and it refers not symbolically, but historically to his scriptural and traditional reputation as an artificer. If he symbolized anything, it would be labor; and a Mason's labor is to acquire truth, and not worldly possessions. The English and French interpretation has fortunately never been introduced into this country.

Tune, Freemasons'. The air of the song written by Matthew Birkhead, and first published in the Book of Constitutions of 1723, with the title of "the Entered Prentice's Song," is familiarly and distinctively known as "the Freemasons' Tune." Mr. William Chappell, in a work entitled Popular Music of the Olden Time, gives the following interesting account of it.

"This tune was very popular at the time of the ballad operas, and I am informed that the same words are still sung to it at Masonic meetings.

"The air was introduced in The Village Opera, The Chambermaid, The Lottery, The Grub-Street Opera, and The Lover his own Rival. It is contained in the third volume of The Dancing Master, and of Walsh's New Country Dancing Master. Words and music are included in Watt's Musical Miscellany, iii. 72, and in British Melody, or The Musical Magazine, fol., 1739. They were also printed on broadsides.

"In the Gentlemen's Magazine, for October, 1731, the first stanza is printed as 'A Health, by Mr. Birkhead.' It seems to be there quoted from 'The Constitutions of the Freemasons,' by the Rev. James Anderson, A.M., one of the Worshipful Masters.

"There are several versions of the tune. One in Pills to Purge Melancholy, ii. 230, (1719), has a second part; but that being almost a repetition of the first, taken an octave higher, is out of the compass of ordinary voices, and has therefore been generally rejected.

"In A Complete Collection of Old and New English and Scotch Songs, ii. 172, (1735,) the name is given as 'Ye Commoners and Peers;' but Leveridge composed another tune to these words.

"In The Musical Mason, or Freemasons' Pocket Companion, being a collection of songs used in all Lodges, to which are added the 'Freemasons' March and Ode,' (8vo, 1791,) this is entitled 'The Entered Apprentice's Song.'

"Many stanzas have been added from time to time, and others have been altered."

Turban. The usual head-dress worn in Eastern nations, consisting of a quilted cap, without rim, and a sash or scarf of cotton or linen wound about the cap. In Royal Arch Chapters, the turban, of a purple color, constitutes the head-dress of the Scribe, because that officer represents the Jewish prophet Haggai.

Turcopolier. The third dignity in the Order of Knights Hospitalers of St. John, or Knights of Malta. It took its name from the Turcoples, a sort of light horse mentioned in the history of the Christian wars in Palestine. The office of Turcopolier was held by the Conventual Bailiff, or head of the language of England. He had the command of the cavalry of the Order.

Turkey. A writer in the Freemasons' Quarterly Review (1844, p. 21,) says that there was a Masonic meeting in Constantinople, at which some Turks were initiated, but that the government prohibited the future meetings. This must have been an irregular Lodge, for organized Masonry was not introduced into Turkey until 1838, when the first Lodges were erected by the Grand Lodge of England. They were, however, soon discontinued, in consequence of the opposition of the Mohammedan hierarchy. A more tolerant spirit, however, now exists, and there is a Provincial Grand Lodge of England, having under its jurisdiction four Lodges at Constantinople and four at Smyrna. There are also four Lodges at Constantinople, under the Grand Orient of France; four at Smyrna and one at Constantinople, under the Grand Orient of Italy; one at Constantinople, under the Grand Lodge of Ireland; and one at Constantinople, under the Grand Lodge of Scotland. There are also three Royal Arch Chapters,—two of them at Smyrna and Constantinople, chartered by the Supreme Chapter of Scotland, and one at Constantinople, chartered by the Grand Chapter of England. There are also two Rose Croix Chapters,—one, from the Supreme Council of England, in Constantinople; and the other, from the Grand Orient of Italy, in Smyrna. In these Lodges many native Mohammedans have been initiated. The Turks, however, have always had secret societies of their own, which has led some writers to suppose, erroneously, that Freemasonry existed long before the date of its actual introduction. Thus, the Begtaschi form a secret society in Turkey, numbering many thousands of Mussulmans in its ranks, and none but a true Moslem can be admitted to the brotherhood. It is a religious Order, and was founded in the year 1328 by the Hadji Begtasch, a famous dervish, from whom it derives its name. The Begtaschi have certain signs and passwords by which they are enabled to recognize the “true brethren,” and by which they are protected from vagabond impostors. A writer in Notes and Queries says, in allusion to this society, that “One day, during the summer of 1855, an English merchant captain, while walking through the streets of a Turkish quarter of Constantinople, encountered a Turk, who made use of various signs of Freemasonry, some of which, the captain being a Mason, he understood, and others he did not.” It is, however, probable in this instance, considering the date, that the Turk was really a Mason, and possessed some higher degrees, which had not been attained by the English captain. There is also another equally celebrated Order in Turkey, the Melewi, who have also secret modes of recognition.

Turquoise. Oliver says (Landm., ii. 521,) that the first stone in the third row of the high priest's breastplate “was a ligure, hyacinth, or turquoise.” The stone was a ligure; but Oliver is incorrect in supposing that it is a synonym of either a hyacinth or a turquoise, which are stones of a very different nature.

Tuscan Order. The simplest of the five orders of architecture, as its columns are never fluted, and it does not allow the introduction of any kind of ornament. It is one of the two modern orders, not being found in any ancient example. Hence it is of no value in Masonic symbolism.

Twelve. Twelve being composed of the mystical numbers $7 + 5$ or of 3×4 , the triad multiplied by the quaternion, was a number of considerable value in ancient systems. Thus there were twelve signs of the zodiac, twelve months in the year, twelve tribes of Israel, twelve stones in the pectoral, and twelve oxen supporting the molten sea in the Temple. There were twelve apostles in the new law, and the New Jerusalem has twelve gates, twelve foundations, is twelve thousand furlongs square, and the number of the sealed is twelve times twelve thousand. Even the Pagans respected this number, for there were in their mythology twelve superior and twelve inferior gods.

Twelve Illustrious Knights. The eleventh degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; more correctly Sublime Knight Elected, which see.

Twelve Lettered Name. The Jews had among their divine names, besides the Tetragrammaton, a two lettered name, which was Jah, a twelve lettered and a forty-two lettered name. None of these, however, were so sacred and unutterable as the Tetragrammaton. Maimonides says of the twelve lettered name, that it was formerly used instead of Adonai, as being more emphatic, in place of the Tetragrammaton, whenever they came to that sacred name in reading. It was not, however, like the Tetragrammaton, communicated only to their disciples, but was imparted to any that desired its knowledge. But after the death of Simeon the Just, the Tetragrammaton ceasing to be used at all, the twelve lettered name was substituted in blessing the people; and then it became a secret name, and was communicated only to the most pious of the priests. What was the twelve lettered name is uncertain, though all agree that it was not a name, but a sentence composed of twelve letters. Rabbi Bechai says it was formed by a triple combination and permutation of the four letters of the Tetragrammaton; and there are other explanations equally unsatisfactory.

There was also a forty-two lettered name, composed, says Bechai, of the first forty-two letters of the book of Genesis. Another and a better explanation has been propounded by Franck, that it is formed out of the names of the ten Sephiroth, which with the y, vau, or and, amount exactly to forty-two letters. There was another name of seventy-two letters, which is still more inexplicable. Of all these names, Maimonides (More Nev., I. lxii.,) says that, as they could not possibly constitute one word, they must have been composed of several words, and he adds:

"There is no doubt that these words conveyed certain ideas, which were designed to bring man nearer to the true conception of the Divine essence, through the process we have already described. These words, composed of numerous letters, have been designated as a single name, because, like all accidental proper names, they indicate one single object; and to make the object more intelligible, several words are employed, as many words are sometimes used to express one single thing. This must be well understood, that they taught the ideas indicated by these names, and not the simple pronunciation of the meaningless letters."

Twelve Original Points of Masonry. The old English lectures, which were abrogated by the United Grand Lodge of England in 1813, when it adopted the system of Hemming, contained the following passage:

"There are in Freemasonry twelve original points, which form the basis of the system, and comprehend the whole ceremony of initiation. Without the existence of these points, no man ever was, or can be, legally and essentially received into the Order. Every person who is made a Mason must go through these twelve forms and ceremonies, not only in the first degree, but in every subsequent one."

Hence, it will be seen that our ancient Brethren deemed these "Twelve Original Points of Masonry," as they were called, of the highest importance to the ceremony of initiation, and they consequently took much pains, and exercised much ingenuity, in giving them a symbolical explanation. But as, by the decree of the Grand Lodge, they no longer constitute a part of the English ritual, and were never introduced into this country, where the "Four Perfect Points" constitute an inadequate substitute, there can be no impropriety in presenting a brief explanation of them, for which I shall be indebted to the industry of Oliver, who has treated of them at great length in the eleventh lecture of his Historical Landmarks.

The ceremony of initiation, when these points constituted a portion of the ritual, was divided into twelve parts, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, to each of which one of the points was referred, in the following manner:

1. The opening of the Lodge was symbolized by the tribe of Reuben, because Reuben was the first-born of his father Jacob, who called him "the beginning of his strength." He was, therefore, appropriately adopted as the emblem of that ceremony which is essentially the beginning of every initiation.

2. The preparation of the candidate was symbolized by the tribe of Simeon, because Simeon prepared the instruments for the slaughter of the Shechemites; and that part of the ceremony which relates to offensive weapons, was used as a token of our abhorrence for the cruelty exercised on that occasion.

3. The report of the Senior Deacon referred to the tribe of Levi, because, in the slaughter of the Shechemites, Levi was supposed to have made a signal or report to Simeon his brother, with whom he was engaged in attacking these unhappy people while unprepared for defence.

4. The entrance of the candidate into the Lodge was symbolized by the tribe of Judah, because they were the first to cross the Jordan and enter the promised land, coming from the darkness and servitude, as it were, of the wilderness into the light and liberty of Canaan.

5. The prayer was symbolized by the tribe of Zebulun, because the blessing and prayer of Jacob were given to Zebulun, in preference to his brother Issachar.

6. The circumambulation referred to the tribe of Issachar, because, as a thriftless and indolent tribe, they required a leader to advance them to an equal elevation with the other tribes.

7. Advancing to the altar was symbolized by the tribe of Dan, to teach us, by contrast, that we should advance to truth and holiness as rapidly as that tribe advanced to idolatry, among whom the golden serpent was first set up to receive adoration.

8. The obligation referred to the tribe of Gad, in allusion to the solemn vow which was made by Jephthah, Judge of Israel, who was of that tribe.

9. The intrusting of the candidate with the mysteries was symbolized by the tribe of Asher, because he was then presented with the rich fruits of Masonic knowledge, as Asher was said to be the inheritor of fatness and royal dainties.

10. The investiture of the lambskin, by which the candidate is declared free, referred to the tribe of Naphtali, which was invested by Moses with a peculiar freedom, when he said, "O Naphtali, satisfied with favor, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the West and the South."

11. The ceremony of the north-east corner of the Lodge referred to Joseph, because, as this ceremony reminds us of the most superficial part of Masonry, so the two half tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, of which the tribe of Joseph was composed, were accounted to be more superficial than the rest, as they were descendants of the grandsons only of Jacob.

12. The closing of the Lodge was symbolized by the tribe of Benjamin, who was the youngest of the sons of Jacob, and thus closed his father's strength.

Such were the celebrated twelve original points of Freemasonry of the ancient English lectures. They were never introduced into this country, and they are now disused in England. But it will be seen that, while some of the allusions are perhaps abstruse, many of them are ingenious and appropriate. It will not, perhaps, be regretted that they have become obsolete; yet it cannot be denied that they added something to the symbolism and to the religious reference of Freemasonry. At all events, they are matters of Masonic antiquity, and, as such, are not unworthy of attention.

Twenty-Four Inch Gauge. A rule two feet long, which is divided by marks into twenty-four parts, each one inch in length. The Operative Mason uses it to take the necessary dimensions of the stone that he is about to prepare. It has been adopted as one of the working-tools of the Entered Apprentice in Speculative Masonry, where its divisions are supposed to represent hours. Hence its symbolic use is to teach him to measure his time so that, of the twenty-four hours of the day, he may devote eight hours to the service of God and a worthy distressed brother, eight hours to his usual vocation, and eight to refreshment and sleep. In the symbolic language of Masonry, therefore, the twenty-four inch gauge is a symbol of time well employed.

Twenty-One. A number of mystical import, partly because it is the product of 3 and 7, the most sacred of the odd numbers, but especially because it is the sum of the numerical value of the letters of the Divine name, Ehehjah, thus:

$$\overline{\text{H}} \quad \text{' } \quad \overline{\text{H}} \quad \text{N} \\ 5 + 10 + 5 + 1 = 21.$$

It is little valued in Masonry, but is deemed of great importance in the Kabbala and in Alchemy; in the latter, because it refers to the twenty-one days of distillation necessary for the conversion of the grosser metals into silver.

Twenty-Seven. Although the number twenty-seven is found in the degree of Select Master and in some of the other high degrees, it can scarcely be called in itself a sacred number. It derives its importance from the fact that it is produced by the multiplication of the square of three by three, thus: $3 \times 3 \times 3 = 27$.

Twenty-Six. This is considered by the Kabbalists as the most sacred of mystical numbers, because it is equal to the numerical value of the letters of the Tetragrammaton, thus:

$$\overline{\text{K}} \quad \text{L} \quad \overline{\text{M}} \quad \text{' } \\ 5 + 6 + 5 + 10 = 26.$$

Two Lettered Name. The title given by the Talmudists to the name of God, $\overline{\text{H}} \overline{\text{L}}$, or Jah, which see.

Tyler. Tyle and Tyler are the old and now obsolete spelling of Tile and Tiler, which see.

Type. In the science of symbology it is the picture or model of something of which it is considered as a symbol. Hence the word type and symbol are in this sense synonymous. Thus the tabernacle was a type of the Temple, as the Temple is a type of the Lodge.

Typhon. The brother and slayer of Osiris, in the Egyptian mythology. As Osiris was a type or symbol of the sun, Typhon was the symbol of winter, when the vigor, heat, and, as it were, life of the sun are destroyed, and of darkness as opposed to light.

Tyre. An ancient city of Phœnicia, which in the time of King Solomon was celebrated as the residence of King Hiram, to whom that monarch and his father David were indebted for great assistance in the construction of the Temple at Jerusalem. Tyre was distant from Jerusalem about one hundred and twenty miles by sea, and was thirty miles nearer by land. An intercourse between the two cities and their respective monarchs was, therefore, easily cultivated. The inhabitants of Tyre were distinguished for their skill as artificers, especially as workers in brass and other metals; and it is said to have been a principal seat of that skilful body of architects known as the Dionysiac fraternity.

The city of Sidon, which was under the Tyrian government, was but twenty miles from Tyre, and situated in the forest of Lebanon. The Sidonians were, therefore, naturally woodcutters, and were engaged in felling the trees, which were afterwards sent on floats by sea from Tyre to Joppa, and thence carried by land to Jerusalem, to be employed in the Temple building.

Dr. Morris, who visited Tyre in 1868, describes it (Freemasonry in the Holy Land, p. 91,) as a city under ground, lying, like Jerusalem, twenty to fifty feet beneath a débris of many centuries. It consists, to use the language of a writer he has cited, of "prostrate and broken columns, dilapidated temples, and mounds of buried fragments."

Tyre, Quarries of. It is an error of Oliver, and some other writers, to suppose that the stones of the Temple of Jerusalem were furnished from the quarries of Tyre. If there were such quarries, they were not used for that purpose, as the stones were taken from the immediate vicinity of the edifice. See Quarries.

Tyrian Freemasons. Those who sustain the hypothesis that Freemasonry originated at the Temple of Solomon have advanced the theory that the Tyrian Freemasons were the members of the Society of Dionysiac Artificers, who at the time of the building of Solomon's Temple flourished at Tyre. Many of them were sent to Jerusalem by Hiram, king of Tyre, to assist King Solomon in the construction of his Temple. There, uniting with the Jews, who had only a knowledge of the speculative principles of Freemasonry, which had been transmitted to them from Noah, through the patriarchs, the Tyrian Freemasons organized that combined system of Operative and Speculative Masonry which continued for many centuries, until the beginning of the eighteenth, to characterize the Institution. This hypothesis is maintained with great ingenuity by Lawrie in his History of Freemasonry, or by Dr. Brewster, if he was really the author of that work, and until recently it has been the most popular theory respecting the origin of Masonry. But as it is wanting in the support of historical evidence, it has yielded to the more plausible speculations of recent writers.

U.

U. D. D. Letters placed after the names of Lodges or Chapters which have not yet received a Warrant of Constitution. They signify Under Dispensation.

Uden, Conrad Friederich. A Masonic writer of some celebrity. He was a Doctor of Medicine, and at one time a Professor in Ordinary of the University of Dorpat; afterwards an Aulic Counsellor and Secretary of the Medical College of St. Petersburg. He was from 1783 to 1785 the editor of the Archiv für Freimaurerei und Rosenkreuzer, published during those years at Berlin. This work contains much interesting information concerning Rosicrucianism. He also edited, in 1785 and 1786, at Altona, the Ephemeriden der gesamten Freimaurerei auf das Logenjahr 1785 und 1786.

Unaffiliated Mason. A Mason who is not a member of any Lodge. As this class of Masons contribute nothing to the revenues nor to the strength of the Order, while they are always willing to partake of its benefits, they have been considered as an encumbrance upon the Craft, and have received the general condemnation of Grand Lodges.

It is evident that, anterior to the present system of Lodge organization, which dates about the end of the last century, there could have been no unaffiliated Masons.

And, accordingly, the first reference that we find to the duty of Lodge membership is in the Charges, published in 1723, in Anderson's Constitutions, where it is said, after describing a Lodge, that "every Brother ought to belong to one;" and that "in ancient times, no Mason or Fellow could be absent from it, especially when warned to appear at it, without incurring a severe censure, until it appeared to the Master and Wardens that pure necessity hindered him." In this last clause, Anderson evidently refers to the regulation in the Old Constitutions, that required attendance on the Annual Assembly. For instance, in the oldest of these, the Halliwell MS., it is said, (I modernize the language,) "that every Master that is a Mason must be at the General Congregation, if he is told in reasonable time where the Assembly shall be holden; and to that Assembly he must go, unless he have a reasonable excuse."

But the "Assembly" was rather in the nature of a Grand Lodge, and neglect to attend its annual meeting would not place the offender in the position of a modern unaffiliated Mason. But after the organization of subordinate Lodges, a permanent membership, which had been before unknown, was then established; and as the revenues of the Lodges, and through them of the Grand Lodge, were to be derived from the contributions of the members, it was found expedient to require every Mason to affiliate with a Lodge, and hence the rule adopted in the Charge already cited. Yet, in Europe, non-affiliation, although deemed to some extent a Masonic offence, has not been visited by any penalty, except that which results from a deprivation of the ordinary advantages of membership in any association.

The modern Constitution of England, however, prescribes that "a brother who is not a subscribing member to some Lodge, shall not be permitted to visit any one Lodge in the town or place where he resides more than once during his secession from the Craft." He is permitted to visit each Lodge once, because it is supposed that this visit is made for the purpose of enabling him to make a selection of the one in which he may prefer working. But afterwards he is excluded, in order to discountenance those brethren who wish to continue members of the Order, and to partake of its benefits, without contributing to its support. The Constitutions of the Grand Lodges of Ireland and Scotland are silent upon the subject, nor is any penalty prescribed for unaffiliation by any of the Grand Lodges of the continent of Europe.

In this country a different view has been taken of the subject, and its Grand Lodges have, with great unanimity, denounced unaffiliated Masons in the strongest terms of condemnation, and visited them with penalties, which vary, however, to some extent in the different jurisdictions. I know, however, of no Grand Lodge in the United States that has not concurred in the opinion that the neglect or refusal of a Mason to affiliate with a Lodge is a Masonic offence, to be visited by some penalty and a deprivation of some rights.

The following principles may be laid down as constituting the law in this country on the subject of unaffiliated Masons:

1. An unaffiliated Mason is still bound by all those Masonic duties and obligations which refer to the Order in general, but not by those which relate to Lodge organization.

2. He possesses, reciprocally, all those rights which are derived from membership in the Order, but none of those which result from membership in a Lodge.

3. He has a right to assistance when in imminent peril, if he asks for that assistance in the conventional way.

4. He has no right to pecuniary aid from a Lodge.

5. He has no right to visit Lodges, or to walk in Masonic processions.

6. He has no right to Masonic burial.

7. He still remains subject to the government of the Order, and may be tried and punished for any offence by the Lodge within whose geographical jurisdiction he resides.

8. And, lastly, as non-affiliation is a violation of Masonic law, he may, if he refuses to abandon that condition, be tried and punished for it, even by expulsion, if deemed necessary or expedient, by any Grand Lodge within whose jurisdiction he lives.

Unanimous Consent. In the beginning of the last century, when Masonry was reviving from the condition of decay into which it had fallen, and when the experiment was tried of transforming it from a partly operative to a purely speculative system, the great object was to maintain a membership which, by the virtuous character of those who composed it, should secure the harmony and prosperity of the infant Institution. A safeguard was therefore to be sought in the care with which Masons should be selected from those who were likely to apply for admission. It was the quality, and not the quantity, that was desired. This safeguard could only be found in the unanimity of the ballot. Hence, in the sixth of the General Regulations, adopted in 1721, it is declared that "no man can be entered a Brother in any particular Lodge, or admitted to be a member thereof, without the unanimous consent of all the members of that Lodge then present when the candidate is proposed, and their consent is formally asked by the Master." And to prevent the exercise of any undue influence of a higher power in forcing an unworthy person upon the Order, it is further said in the same article: "Nor is this inherent privilege subject to a dispensation; because the members of a particular Lodge are the best judges of it; and if a fractious member should be imposed on them, it might spoil their harmony, or hinder their freedom; or even break and disperse the Lodge." But a few years after, the Order being now on a firm footing, this prudent fear of "spoiling harmony," or "dispersing the Lodge," seems to have been lost sight of, and the brethren began in many Lodges to desire a release from the restrictions laid upon them by the necessity for unanimous consent. Hence Anderson says in his second edition: "But it was found inconvenient to insist upon unanimity in several cases. And, therefore, the Grand Masters have allowed the Lodges to admit a member if not above three ballots are against him; though some Lodges desire no such allowance." This rule still prevails in England; and its modern Constitution still permits the admission of a Mason where there are not more than three ballots against him, though many of the Lodges still demand unanimity.

In the United States, where Masonry is more popular than in any other country, it was soon seen that the danger of the Institution lay not in the paucity, but in the multitude of its members, and that the only provision for guarding its portals was the most stringent regulation of the ballot. Hence, in every jurisdiction of the United States, I think, without an exception, unanimous consent is required. And this rule has been found to work with such advantage to the Order, that the phrase, "the black ball is the bulwark of Masonry," has become a proverb.

Unfavorable Report. Should the committee of investigation on the character of a petitioner for initiation make an unfavorable report, the general usage is (although some Grand Lodges have decided otherwise) to consider the candidate rejected by such report, without proceeding to the formality of a ballot, which is therefore dispensed with. This usage is founded on the principles of common sense; for, as by the ancient Constitutions one black ball is sufficient to reject an application, the unfavorable report of a committee must necessarily, and by consequence, include two unfavorable votes at least. It is therefore unnecessary to go into a ballot after such a report, as it is to be taken for granted that the brethren who reported unfavorably would, on a resort to the ballot, cast their negative votes. Their report is indeed virtually considered as the casting of such votes, and the applicant is therefore at once rejected without a further and unnecessary ballot.

Uniformity of Work. An identity of forms in opening and closing, and in conferring the degrees, constitutes what is technically called uniformity of work. The expression has no reference, in its restricted sense, to the working of the same degrees in different Rites and different countries, but only to a similarity in the ceremonies practised by Lodges in the same Rite, and more especially in the same jurisdiction. This is greatly to be desired, because nothing is more unpleasant to a Mason, accustomed to certain forms and ceremonies in his own Lodge, than on a visit to another to find those forms and ceremonies so varied as to be sometimes scarcely recognizable as parts of the same Institution. So anxious are the dogmatic authorities in Masonry to preserve this uniformity, that in the charge to an Entered Apprentice he is instructed never to "suffer an infringement of our rites, or a deviation from established usages and customs." In the act of union in 1813, of the two Grand Lodges of England, in whose systems of working there were many differences, it was provided that a committee should be appointed to visit the several Lodges, and promulgate and enjoin one system, "that perfect reconciliation, unity of obligation, law, working, language, and dress, might be happily restored to the English Craft." A few years ago, a writer in C. W. Moore's Magazine, proposed the appointment of delegates to visit the Grand Lodges of England, Scotland, and Ireland, that a system of work and lectures might be adopted, which should thereafter be rigidly enforced in both hemispheres. The proposition was not popular, and no delegation was ever appointed. It is well that it was so, for no such attempt could have met with a successful result.

It is a fact, that uniformity of work in Masonry, however much it may be desired, can never be attained. This must be the case in all institutions where the ceremonies, the legends, and the instructions are oral. The treachery of memory, the weakness of judgment, and the fertility of imagination, will lead men to forget, to diminish, or to augment, the parts of any system which is not prescribed within certain limits by a written rule. The Rabbins discovered this when the Oral Law was becoming perverted, and losing its authority as well as its identity by the interpretations that were given to it in the schools of the Scribes and Prophets. And hence, to restore it to its integrity, it was found necessary to divest it of its oral character and give to it a written form. To this are we to attribute the origin of the two Talmuds which now contain the essence of Jewish theology. So, while in Masonry we find the esoteric ritual continually subjected to errors arising mainly from the ignorance or the fancy of Masonic teachers, the monitorial instructions—few in Preston, but greatly enlarged by Webb and Cross—have suffered no change.

It would seem from this that the evil of non-conformity could be removed only by making all the ceremonies monitorial; and so much has this been deemed expedient, that a few years since the subject of a written ritual was seriously discussed in England. But the remedy would be worse than the disease. It is to the oral character of its ritual that Masonry is indebted for its permanence and success as an organization. A written, which would soon become a printed, ritual would divest Symbolic Masonry of its attractions as a secret association, and would cease to offer a reward to the laborious student who sought to master its mystical science. Its philosophy and its symbolism would be the same, but the books containing them would be consigned to the shelves of a Masonic library, their pages to be discussed by the profane as the common property of the antiquary, while the Lodges, having no mystery within their portals, would find but few visitors, and certainly no workers.

It is, therefore, a matter of congratulation that uniformity of work, however desirable and however unattainable, is not so important and essential as many have deemed it. Oliver, for instance, seems to confound in some of his writings the ceremonies of a degree with the landmarks of the Order. But they are very different. The landmarks, because they affect the identity of the Institution, have long since been embodied in its written laws, and unless by a wilful perversion, as in France, where the Grand Mastership has been abolished, can never be changed. But variations in the phraseology of the lectures, or in the forms and ceremonies of initiation, so long as they do not trench upon the foundations of symbolism on which the science and philosophy of Masonry are built, can produce no other effect than a temporary inconvenience. The errors of an ignorant Master will be corrected by his better instructed successor. The variation in the ritual can never be such as to destroy the true identity of the Institution. Its profound dogmas of the unity of God, and the eternal life, and of the universal brotherhood of man, taught in its symbolic method, will forever shine out pre-eminent above all temporary changes of phraseology. Uniformity of work may not be attained, but uniformity of design and uniformity of character will forever preserve Freemasonry from disintegration.

Union, Grand Masters'. Efforts were made at various times in Germany to organize an association of the Grand Masters of the Grand Lodges of Germany. At length, through the efforts of Bro. Warnatz, the Grand Master of Saxony, the scheme was fully accomplished, and on May 31, 1868, the Grand Masters' Union — Grossmeistertag, literally, the diet of Grand Masters — assembled at the city of Berlin, the Grand Masters of seven German Grand Lodges being present. The meetings of this body, which are annual, are entirely unofficial; it claims no legislative powers, and meets only for consultation and advisement on matters connected with the ritual, the history, and the philosophy of Masonry.

Union Master's Degree. An honorary degree, said to have been invented by the Lodge of Reconciliation in England, in 1813, at the union of the two Grand Lodges, and adopted by the Grand Lodge of New York in 1819, which authorized its Lodges to confer it. It was designed to detect clandestine and irregular Masons, and consisted only of the investiture of the recipient with certain new modes of recognition.

Union of German Masons. (Verein deutscher Maurer.) An association of Freemasons of Germany organized at Potsdam, May 19, 1861. The society meets annually at different places. Its professed object is the cultivation of Masonic science, the advancement of the prosperity and usefulness of the Order, and the closer union of the members in the bonds of brotherly love and affection.

Union of Scientific Freemasons. (Bund wissenschaftlicher Freimaurer.) An association founded, November 28, 1802, by Fessler, Fischer, Mossdorf, and other learned Masons of Germany. According to their act of union, all the members pledged themselves to investigate the history of Freemasonry, from its origin down to the present time, in all its different parts, with all its systems and retrogressions, in the most complete manner, and then to communicate what they knew to trustworthy brethren.

In the assemblies of the members, there were no rituals, nor ceremonies, nor any especial vestments requisite, nor, indeed, any outward distinctions whatever. A common interest and the love of truth, a general aversion of all deception, treachery, and secrecy were the sentiments which bound them together, and made them feel the duties incumbent on them, without binding themselves by any special oath. Consequently, the members of the Scientific Union had all equal rights and obligations; they did not acknowledge a superior, or subordination to any Masonic authority whatever.

Any upright, scientifically-cultivated Master Mason, a sincere seeker after truth, might join this Union, no matter to what Rite or Grand Lodge he belonged, if the whole of the votes were given in his favor, and he pledged himself faithfully to carry out the intention of the founders of the Order.

Each circle of scientific Masons was provided with a number of copies of the deed of union, and every new candidate, when he signed it, became a partaker of the privileges shared in by the whole; the Chief Archives and the centre of the Confederation were at first to be in Berlin.

But the association, thus inaugurated with the most lofty pretensions and the most sanguine expectations, did not well succeed. "Brethren," says Findel, (Hist., Lyon's Trans., p. 501,) "whose co-operation had been reckoned upon, did not join; the active working of others was crippled by all sorts of scruples and hindrances, and Fessler's purchase of Kleinwall drew off his attention wholly from the subject. Differences of opinion, perhaps also too great egotism, caused dissensions between many members of the association and the brethren of the Lodge at Altenburg. Distrust was excited in every man's breast, and, instead of the enthusiasm formerly exhibited, there was only lukewarmness and disgust."

Other schemes, especially that of the establishment of a Saxon Grand Lodge, impaired the efforts of the Scientific Masons. The Union gradually sunk out of sight, and finally ceased to exist.

Union of the Twenty-Two. See German Union of Two and Twenty.

United Grand Lodge of England. The present Grand Lodge of England assumed that title in the year 1813, because it was then formed by the union of the Grand Lodge of the Ancients, called the "Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of England according to the Old Institutions," and the Grand Lodge of Moderns, called the "Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons under the Constitution of England." The body thus formed, by which an end was put to the dissensions of the Craft which had existed in England for more than three-quarters of a century, adopted the title, by which it has ever since been known, of the "United Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons of England."

United States of America. The history of the introduction of Freemasonry into the United States of America is discussed in this work under the titles of the different States into which the Union is divided, and to which therefore the reader is referred.

It may, however, be necessary to say, in a general view of the subject, that the first notice we have of Freemasonry in the United States is in 1729, in which year, during the Grand Mastership of the Duke of Norfolk, Mr. Daniel Cox was appointed Provincial Grand Master for New Jersey. I have not, however, been able to obtain any evidence that he exercised his prerogative by the establishment of Lodges in that province, although it is probable that he did. In the year 1733, the "St. John's Grand Lodge" was opened in Boston, in consequence of a Charter granted, on the application of several brethren residing in that city, by Lord Viscount Montacute, Grand Master of England. From that time Masonry was rapidly disseminated throughout the country by the establishment of Provincial Grand Lodges, all of which after the Revolutionary War, which separated the colonies from the mother country, assumed the rank and prerogatives of independent Grand Lodges. The history of these bodies being treated under their respective titles, the remainder of this article may more properly be devoted to the character of the Masonic organization in the United States.

The Rite practised in this country is most correctly called the American Rite. This title, however, has been adopted within only a comparatively recent period. It is still very usual with Masonic writers to call the Rite practised in this country the York Rite. The expression, however, is wholly incorrect. The Masonry of the United States, though founded, like that practised in every other country, upon the three symbolic degrees which alone constitute the true York Rite, has, by its modifications and its adoption of high degrees, so changed the Rite as to give it an entirely different form from that which properly constitutes the pure York Rite. (See American Rite.)

In each State of the Union, and in most of the Territories, there is a Grand Lodge which exercises jurisdiction over the symbolic degrees. The jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge, however, is exercised to a certain extent over what are called the higher bodies, namely, the Chapters, Councils, and Commanderies. For by the American construction of Masonic law, a Mason expelled by the Grand Lodge forfeits his membership in all of these bodies to which he may be attached. Hence a Knight Templar, or a Royal Arch Mason, becomes ipso facto suspended or expelled by his suspension or expulsion by a symbolic Lodge, the appeal from which action lies only to the Grand Lodge. Thus the Masonic standing and existence of even the Grand Commander of a Grand Commandery is actually in the hands of the Grand Lodge, by whose decree of expulsion his relation with the body over which he presides may be severed.

Royal Arch Masonry is controlled in each State by a Grand Chapter. Besides these Grand Chapters, there is a General Grand Chapter of the United States, which, however, exercises only a moral influence over the State Grand Chapters, since it possesses "no power of discipline, admonition, censure, or instruction over the Grand Chapters." In Territories where there are no Grand Chapters, the General Grand Chapter constitutes subordinate Chapters, and over these it exercises plenary jurisdiction.

The next highest branch of the Order is Cryptic Masonry, which, although rapidly growing, is not yet as extensive as Royal Arch Masonry. It consists of two degrees, Royal and Select Master, to which is sometimes added the Super Excellent, which, however, is considered only as an honorary degree. These degrees are conferred in Councils which owe their obedience to Grand Councils. Only one Grand Council can exist in a State or Territory, as is the case with a Grand Lodge, a Grand Chapter, or a Grand Commandery. Grand Councils exist in many of the States, and in any State where no such body exists, the Councils are established by Charters emanating from any one of them. There is no General Grand Council. Efforts have been repeatedly made to establish one, but the proposition has not met with a favorable response from the majority of Grand Councils.

Templarism is governed by a Supreme body, whose style is the Grand Encampment of the United States, and this body, which meets triennially, possesses sovereign power over the whole Templar system in the United States. Its presiding officer is called Grand Master, and this is the highest office known to American Templarism. In most of the States there are Grand Commanderies, which exercise immediate jurisdiction over the Commanderies in the State, subject, however, to the superintending control of the Grand Encampment. Where there are no Grand Commanderies, Charters are issued directly to subordinate Commanderies by the Grand Encampment.

The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite is very popular in the United States. There are two Supreme Councils,—one for the Southern Jurisdiction, which is the Mother Council of the world. Its nominal Grand East is at Charleston, South Carolina; but its Secretariat has been removed to Washington city since the year 1870. The other Council is for the Northern Jurisdiction. Its Grand East is at Boston, Massachusetts; but its Secretariat is at New York city. The Northern Council has jurisdiction over the States of Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. The Southern Supreme Council exercises jurisdiction over all the other States and Territories of the United States.

United Supreme Council. A body of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite was formed February 13, 1832, in the city of New York, by the union of the so-called Supreme Council of the United States and the Supreme Council of South America, which assumed the title of the "United Supreme Council for the Western Hemisphere." This body, irregular in its formation and illegal in its origin, was never recognized by either of the regular Supreme Councils of the United States, and is now extinct.

Unity of God. In the popular mythology of the ancients there were many gods. It was to correct this false opinion, and to teach a purer theogony, that the initiations were invented. And so, as Warburton says, "the famous secret of the mysteries was the unity of the Godhead." This, too, is the doctrine of Masonic initiation, which is equally distant from the blindness of atheism and the folly of polytheism.

Universality of Masonry. The boast of the Emperor Charles V., that the sun never set on his vast empire, may be applied with equal truth to the Order of Freemasonry. From east to west, and from north to south, over the whole habitable globe, are our Lodges disseminated. Wherever the wandering steps of civilized man have left their footprints, there have our temples been established. The lessons of Masonic love have penetrated into the wilderness of the West, and the red man of our soil has shared with his more enlightened brother the mysteries of our science; while the arid sands of the African desert have more than once been the scene of a Masonic greeting. Masonry is not a fountain, giving health and beauty to some single hamlet, and slaking the thirst of those only who dwell upon its humble banks; but it is a mighty stream, penetrating through every hill and mountain, and gliding through every field and valley of the earth, bearing in its beneficent bosom the abundant waters of love and charity for the poor, the widow, and the orphan of every land.

Universal Language. See Language, Universal.

Universal Harmony, Order of. See Mesmeric Masonry.

Universi Terrarum, etc. Documents emanating from any of the bodies of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite commence with the following epigraph: "Universi Terrarum Orbis Architectonis per Gloriam Ingentis," i. e., "By the Glory of the Grand Architect of the Universe." This is the correct form as first published, in 1802, by the Mother Council at Charleston in its Circular of that year, and used in all its Charters and Patents.

Unknown Philosopher. One of the mystical and theosophic works written by Saint Martin, the founder of the Rite of Martinism, was entitled Le Philosophe Inconnu, or The Unknown Philosopher, whence the appellation was often given by his disciples to the author. A degree of his Rite also received the same name.

Unknown Superiors. When the Baron Von Hund established his system or Rite of Strict Observance, he declared that the Order was directed by certain Masons of superior rank, whose names as well as their designs were to be kept secret from all the brethren of the lower degrees; although there was an insinuation that they were to be found or to be heard of in Scotland. To these secret dignitaries he gave the title of "Superiores Incogniti," or Unknown Superiors. Many Masonic writers, suspecting that Jesuitism was at the bottom of all the Masonry of that day, asserted that S. I., the initials of Superiores Incogniti, meant really Societas Jesu, i. e., the Society of Jesus or the Jesuits. It is scarcely necessary now to say that the whole story of the Unknown Superiors was a myth.

Untempered Mortar. In the lecture used in the United States in the early part of the present century, and in some parts of the country almost as recently as the middle of the century, the apprentices at the Temple were said to wear their aprons in the peculiar manner characteristic of that class that they might preserve their garments from being defiled by "untempered mortar." This is mortar which has not been properly mixed for use, and it thus became a symbol of passions and appetites not duly restrained. Hence the Speculative Apprentice was made to wear his apron in that peculiar manner to teach him that he should not allow his soul to be defiled by the "untempered mortar of unruly passions."

Unutterable Name. The Tetragrammaton, or Divine Name, which is more commonly called the Ineffable Name. The two words are precisely synonymous.

Unworthy Members. That there are men in our Order whose lives and characters reflect no credit on the Institution, whose ears turn coldly from its beautiful lessons of morality, whose hearts are untouched by its soothing influences of brotherly kindness, whose hands are not opened to aid in its deeds of charity, is a fact which we cannot deny, although we may be permitted to express our grief while we acknowledge its truth. But these men, though in the Temple, are not of the Temple; they are among us, but are not with us; they belong to our household, but they are not of our faith; they are of Israel, but they are not Israel. We have sought to teach them, but they would not be instructed; seeing, they have not perceived; and hearing, they have not understood the symbolic language in which our lessons of wisdom are communicated. The fault is not with us, that we have not given, but with them, that they have not received. And, indeed, hard and unjust would it be to censure the Masonic institution, because, partaking of the infirmity and weakness of human wisdom and human means, it has been unable to give strength and perfection to all who come within its pale. The denial of a Peter, the doubtings of a Thomas, or even the betrayal of a Judas, could cast no reproach on that holy band of Apostles of which each formed a constituent part.

"Is Freemasonry answerable," says Dr. Oliver, (Landm., i., p. 148,) "for the misdeeds of an individual Brother? By no means. He has had the advantage of Masonic instruction, and has failed to profit by it. He has enjoyed Masonic privileges, but has not possessed Masonic virtue." Such a man it is our duty to reform, or to dismiss; but the world should not condemn us, if we fail in our attempt at reformation. God alone can change the heart. Masonry furnishes precepts and obligations of duty which, if obeyed, must make its members wiser, better, happier men; but it claims no power of regeneration. Condemn when our instruction is evil, but not when our pupils are dull, and deaf to our lessons; for, in so doing, you condemn the holy religion which you profess. Masonry prescribes no principles that are opposed to the sacred teachings of the Divine Lawgiver, and sanctions no acts that are not consistent with the sternest morality and the most faithful obedience to government and the laws; and while this continues to be its character, it cannot, without the most atrocious injustice, be made responsible for the acts of its unworthy members.

Of all human societies, Freemasonry is undoubtedly, under all circumstances, the fittest to form the truly good man. But however well conceived may be its laws, they cannot completely change the natural disposition of those who ought to observe them. In truth, they serve as lights and guides; but as they can only direct men by restraining the impetuosity of their passions, these last too often become dominant, and the Institution is forgotten.

Upper Chambers. The practice of holding Masonic Lodges in the upper rooms of houses is so universal that, in all my experience, I have no knowledge of a single instance in which a Lodge has been holden in a room on the first floor of a building. The most apparent reason for this is, that security from being overseen or overheard may be thus obtained, and hence Dr. Oliver says, in his Book of the Lodge, (p. 44,) that "a Masonic hall should be isolated, and, if possible, surrounded with lofty walls. . . . As, however, such a situation in large towns, where Masonry is usually practised, can seldom be obtained with convenience to the brethren, the Lodge should be formed in an upper story." This, as a practical reason, will be perhaps sufficient to Masons in general. But to those who are more curious, it may be well to say, that for this custom there is also a mystical reason of great antiquity.

Gregory, in his Notes and Observations on some Passages of Scripture, (1671, p. 17,) says: "The upper rooms in Scripture were places in that part of the house which was highest from the ground, set apart by the Jews for their private orisons and devotions, to be addressed towards Solomon's Temple." This room received, in the Hebrew language, the appellation of Alijah, which has been translated by the Greek hyperoon, and improperly by the Latin cœnaculum. The Hebrew and the Greek both have the signification of an upper room, while the Latin appellation would give the idea of a dining-room or place for eating, thus taking away the sacred character of the apartment. The Alijah was really a secret chamber or recess in the upper part of the house, devoted to religious uses. Hence the wise men or Rabbins of Israel are called by the Talmudists beni Alijah, or "the sons of the upper or secret room." And so, in Psalm civ. 2, 3, the Psalmist speaks of God as stretching out the heavens like a curtain, and laying the beams of his chambers in the waters, where, in the original, the word here translated "chambers" is the plural of Alijah, and should more properly be rendered "his secret chambers:" an allusion, as Dr. Clarke thinks, to the holy of holies of the tabernacle. Again, in 2 Chronicles ix. 3, 4, it is said that when the Queen of Sheba had seen the wisdom of Solomon and the house that he had built—his provisions, servants, and cup-bearers, "and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord—there was no more spirit in her." The word which our translators have rendered "his ascent," is again this word Alijah, and the passage should be rendered "his secret chamber," or "upper room;" the one by which, through a private way, he was enabled to pass into the Temple.

On the advent of Christianity, this Jewish custom of worshipping privately in an upper room was adopted by the apostles and disciples, and the New Testament contains many instances of the practice, the word Alijah being, as I have already remarked, translated by the Greek hyperoon, which has a similar meaning. Thus in Acts i. 13, we find the apostles praying in an upper room; and again, in the twentieth chapter, the disciples are represented as having met at Ephesus in an upper room, where Peter preached to them. But it is unnecessary to multiply instances of this usage. The evidence is complete that the Jews, and after them the primitive Christians, performed their devotions in upper rooms. And the care with which Alijah, hyperoon, or upper chamber, is always used to designate the place of devotion, abundantly indicates that any other place would have been considered improper.

Hence we may trace the practice of holding Lodges in upper rooms to this ancient custom; and that, again, has perhaps some connection with the sacred character always given by the ancients to "high places," so that it is said, in the Masonic lectures, that our ancient brethren met on high hills and low vales. The reason there assigned by implication is that the meeting may be secret; that is, the lectures place the Lodge on a high hill, a vale, or other secret place. And this reason is more definitely stated in the modern lectures, which say that they so met "to observe the approach of cowans and eavesdroppers, and to guard against surprise." Yet it is not improbable that the ancient symbolism of the sanctity of a high place was referred to as well as that more practical idea of secrecy and safety.

Upright Posture. The upright posture of the Apprentice in the north-east corner, as a symbol of upright conduct, was introduced into the ritual by Preston, who taught in his lectures that the candidate then represented "a just and upright man and Mason." The same symbolism is referred to by Hutchinson, who says that "as the builder raises his column by the plane and perpendicular, so should the Mason carry himself towards the world." Indeed, the application of the corner-stone, or the square stone, as a symbol of uprightness of conduct, which is precisely the Masonic symbolism of the candidate in the north-east, was familiar to the ancients; for Plato says that he who valiantly sustains the shocks of adverse fortune, demeaning himself uprightly, is truly good and of a square posture.

Uriel. Hebrew, אוריאל, meaning the fire of God. An archangel, mentioned only in 2 Esdras. Michael Glycas, the Byzantine historian, says that his post is in the sun, and that he came down to Seth and Enoch, and instructed them in the length of the years and the variations of the seasons. The book of Enoch describes him as the angel of thunder and lightning. In some of the Hermetic degrees of Masonry, the name, as representing the angel of fire, becomes a significant word.

Urim and Thummim. The Hebrew words אורים, Aurim, and תמים, Thummim, have been variously translated by commentators. The Septuagint translates them, "manifestation and truth;" the Vulgate, "doctrine and truth;" Aquila, "lights and perfections;" Kalisch, "perfect brilliancy;" but the most generally received interpretation is, "light and truth." What the Urim and Thummim were has also been a subject of as much doubt and difference of opinion. Suddenly introduced to notice by Moses in the command, (Exod. xxviii. 30,) "and thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim,"—as if they were already familiar to the people,—we know only of them from the scriptural account, that they were sacred lots to be worn concealed in or behind the breastplate, and to be consulted by the high priest alone, for the purpose of obtaining a revelation of the will of God in matters of great moment. Some writers have supposed that the augury consisted in a more splendid appearance of certain letters of the names of the tribes inscribed upon the stones of the breastplate; others, that it was received by voice from two small images which were placed beyond the folds of the breastplate. A variety of other conjectures have been hazarded, but as Godwyn (Moses and Aaron, iv. 8,) observes, "he spoke best, who ingeniously confessed that he knew not what Urim and Thummim was."

The opinion now almost universally accepted is that the Jewish lawgiver borrowed this, as he did the ark, the brazen serpent, and many other of the symbols of his theocracy, from the usages so familiar to him of the Egyptian priests, with which both he and Aaron were familiar, eliminating, of course, from them their previous heathen allusion, and giving to them a purer signification.

In reference to the Urim and Thummim, we know not only from the authority of ancient writers, but also from the confirmatory testimony of more recent monumental explorations, that the judges of Egypt wore golden chains around their necks, to which was suspended a small figure of Themè, the Egyptian goddess of Justice and Truth. "Some of these breastplates," says Gliddon, (Anc. Egypt, p. 32,) "are extant in European museums; others are to be seen on the monuments as containing the figures of two deities—Ra, the sun, and Themè. These represent Ra, or the sun, in a double capacity, physical and intellectual light; and Themè in a double capacity, justice and truth."

Neither in Ancient Craft nor in Royal Arch Masonry have the Urim and Thummim been introduced; although Oliver discusses them, in his Landmarks, as a type of Christ, to be Masonically applied in his peculiar system of a Christian interpretation of all the Masonic symbols. But the fact that after the construction of the Temple of Solomon we hear no more of the consultation by the priests of the Urim and Thummim, which seem to have given way to the audible interpretation of the divine will by the prophets, would necessarily disconnect them with Masonry as a symbol, to be accepted even by those who place the foundation of the Order at the Solomonic era.

Yet they have been introduced as a symbol into some of the continental high degrees. Thus, in the last degree of the Order of Brothers of Asia, the presiding officer wears the Urim and Thummim suspended from a golden chain as the jewel of his office.

Reghellini (Espit du dogme, p. 60,) thus gives the continental interpretation of the symbol.

"The folly of Solomon is commemorated in the instructions and ceremonies of a high degree, where the Acolyte is reminded that Solomon, becoming arrogant, was for a time abandoned by the Divinity, and as he was, although the greatest of kings, only a mortal, he was weak enough to sacrifice to idols, and thereby lost the communication which he had previously had through the Urim and Thummim.

"These two words are found in a degree of the Maitre écossais. The Venerables of the Lodges and the Sublime Masters explain the legend to their recipients of an elevated rank, as intended to teach them that they should always be guided by reason, virtue, and honor, and never abandon themselves to an effeminate life or silly superstition."

It is, I think, undeniable that Urim and Thummim have no legitimate existence as a Masonic symbol, and that they can only be considered such by a forced and modern interpretation.

Uriot, Joseph. The author of a work entitled Le véritable Portrait d'un Franc-Maçon, which was published by a Lodge at Frankfort, in 1742. It may be looked upon, says Kloss, as the earliest public exposition of the true principles of Masonry which appeared in Germany. Many editions of it were published. M. Uriot also published at Stongard, in 1769, a work entitled Lettres sur la Franche Maçonnerie; which was, however, only an enlargement of the Portrait.

Urn. Among the ancients, cinerary urns were in common use to hold the ashes of the deceased after the body had been subjected to incineration, which was the usual mode of disposing of it. He who would desire to be learned upon this subject should read Sir Thomas Browne's celebrated work entitled Hydriotaphia, or Urn Burial, where everything necessary to be known on this topic may be found. In Masonry, the cinerary urn has been introduced as a modern symbol, but always as having reference to the burial of the Temple Builder. In the comparatively recent symbol of the Monument, fabricated by Cross for the degree of Master in the American Rite, the urn is introduced as if to remind the beholder that the ashes of the great artist were there deposited. Cross borrowed, it may be supposed, his idea from an older symbol in the high degrees, where, in the description of the tomb of Hiram Abif, it is said that the heart was enclosed in a golden urn, to the side of which a triangular stone was affixed, inscribed with the letters J. M. B. within a wreath of acacia, and placed on the top of an obelisk.

Uruguay. Freemasonry was introduced into the Republic of Uruguay by the Grand Orient of France, which, in 1827, chartered a Lodge called "the Children of the New World." Up to 1856, other Lodges were established by the G. Bodies of France and Brazil. In that year authority was obtained from the Supreme Council and Grand Orient of Brazil, Valley of Lavradio, to establish a governing Masonic body, and the Supreme Council and Grand Orient of Uruguay was regularly constituted at Montevideo, in the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Usages. See Usages, in Addendum.

Utah. Freemasonry was introduced into the Territory, October 7, 1867, by the Grand Lodge of Montana, which chartered Wasatch Lodge, No. 8. Mount Moriah Lodge, No. 70, was chartered October 21, 1868, by the Grand Lodge of Kansas, and Argenta Lodge, No. 21, by the Grand Lodge of Colorado, September 26, 1871. All of these Lodges are situated in Salt Lake City. In January 16-20, 1872, the representatives of the three Lodges met at Salt Lake City and organized the Grand Lodge of Utah, O. F. Strickland being elected Grand Master.

Vacancies in Office. Every Masonic officer is elected and installed to hold his office for the time for which he has been elected, and until his successor shall be installed. This is in the nature of a contract between the officer and the Lodge, Chapter, or other body which has elected him, and to its terms he signifies his assent in the most solemn manner at the time of his installation. It follows from this that to resign the office would be on his part to violate his contract. Vacancies in office, therefore, can only occur by death. Even a removal from the jurisdiction, with the intention of permanent absence, will not vacate a Masonic office, because the person removing might change his intention, and return. For the reasons why neither resignation nor removal can vacate an office, see Succession to the Chair.

Vale or Valley. The vale or valley was introduced at an early period into the symbolism of Masonry. A catechism of the beginning of the last century says that "the Lodge stands upon holy ground, or the highest hill or lowest vale, or in the vale of Jehoshaphat, or any other secret place." And Browne, who in the beginning of the present century gave a correct version of the Prestonian lectures, says that

"our ancient brethren met on the highest hills, the lowest dales, even in the valley of Jehoshaphat, or some such secret place."

Hutchinson (Sp. of Mas., p. 58,) has dilated on this subject, but, as I think, with a mistaken view of the true import of the symbol. He says: "We place the spiritual Lodge in the vale of Jehoshaphat, implying thereby that the principles of Masonry are derived from the knowledge of God, and are established in the judgment of the Lord." And he adds: "The highest hills and lowest valleys were from the earliest times esteemed sacred, and it was supposed the spirit of God was peculiarly diffusive in those places."

It is true that worship in high places was an ancient idolatrous usage. But there is no evidence that the superstition extended to valleys. Hutchinson's subsequent reference to the Druidical and Oriental worship in groves has no bearing on the subject, for groves are not necessarily valleys. The particular reference to the valley of Jehoshaphat would seem in that case to carry an allusion to the peculiar sanctity of that spot, as meaning, in the original, the valley of the judgment of God. But the fact is that the old Masons did not derive their idea, that the Lodge was situated in a valley, from any idolatrous practice of the ancients.

Valley, in Masonry, is a symbol of secrecy. And although I am not disposed to believe that the use of the word in this sense was borrowed from any meaning which it had in Hebrew, yet it is a singular coincidence that the Hebrew word for valley, gmemeth, signifies also "deep," or, as Bate (Critica Hebraea) defines it, "whatever lies remote from sight, as counsels and designs which are deep or close." This very word is used in Job xii. 22, where it is said that God "discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death."

The Lodge, therefore, is said to be placed in a valley because, the valley being the symbol of secrecy, it is intended to indicate the secrecy in which the acts of the Lodge should be concealed. And this interpretation agrees precisely with what is said in the passages already cited, where the Lodge is said to stand in the lowest vale "or any secret place." It is supported also by the present lecture in this country, the ideas of which at least Webb derived from Preston. It is there taught that our ancient brethren met on the highest hills and lowest vales, the better to observe the approach of covans and eavesdroppers, and to guard against surprise.

Valley. In the caputular degrees of the French Rite, this word is used instead of Orient, to designate the seat of the Chapter. Thus on such a body a document would be dated from the "Valley of Paris," instead of the "Orient of Paris." The word, says the Dictionnaire Maçonique, is often incorrectly employed to designate the south and north sides of the Lodge, where the expression should be "the column of the south" and "the column of the north." Thus, a Warden will address the brethren of his valley, instead of the brethren of his column. The valley includes the whole Lodge or Chapter; the columns are its divisions.

Vassal, Pierre Gerard. A French physician and Masonic writer, who was born at Manosques, in France, October 14, 1769. He was intended by his parents for the Church, and entered the Seminary of Marseilles for the purpose of pursuing his ecclesiastical studies. At the commencement of the revolution he left the school and joined the army, where, however, he remained only eighteen months. He then applied himself to the study of medicine, and pursued the practice of the profession during the rest of his life, acquiring a large reputation as a physician. He was elected a member of several medical societies, to whose transactions he contributed several valuable essays. He is said to have introduced to the profession the use of the digitalis purpurea as a remedial agent, especially in diseases of the heart. He was initiated into Masonry about the year 1811, and thenceforth took an active part in the Institution. He presided in the Lodge, Chapter, and Areopagus of the Sept Ecosais réunis with great zeal and devotion; was in 1819 elected Secretary General of the Grand Orient, and in 1827 President of the College of Rites. He attained the thirty-third degree of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, and was a warm advocate of Scottish Masonry. But his zeal was tempered by his judgment, and he did not hesitate to denounce the errors that had crept into the system, an impartiality of criticism which greatly surprised Ragon. His principal Masonic works are Essai historique sur l'institution du Rit Ecosais, etc., Paris, 1827, and a valuable historical contribution to Masonry entitled Cours complet de la Maçonnerie, ou Histoire générale de l'Initiation depuis son Origine jusqu'à son institution en France, Paris, 1832. In private life, Vassal was distinguished for his kind heart and benevolent disposition. The Lodge of Sept Ecosais réunis presented him a medal in 1830 as a recognition of his active labors in Masonry. He died May 4, 1840, at Paris.

Vault of Steel. (Voute d'acier.) The French Masons so call the Arch of Steel, which see.

Vault, Secret. As a symbol, the Secret Vault does not present itself in the primary degrees of Masonry. It is found only in the high degrees, such as the Royal Arch of all the Rites, where it plays an important part. Dr. Oliver, in his Historical Landmarks, (vol. ii., p. 434,) gives, while referring to the building of the second Temple, the following general detail of the Masonic legend of this vault.

"The foundations of the Temple were opened, and cleared from the accumulation of rubbish, that a level might be procured for the commencement of the building. While engaged in excavations for this purpose, three fortunate sojourners are said to have discovered our ancient stone of foundation, which had been deposited in the secret crypt by Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty, to prevent the communication of ineffable secrets to profane or unworthy persons. The discovery having been communicated to the prince, prophet, and priest of the Jews, the stone was adopted as the chief corner-stone of the re-edified building, and thus became, in a new and more expressive sense, the type of a more excellent dispensation. An avenue was also accidentally discovered, supported by seven pair of pillars, perfect and entire, which, from their situation, had escaped the fury of the flames that had consumed the Temple, and the desolation of war that had destroyed the city. The secret vault, which had been built by Solomon as a secure depository for certain secrets that would inevitably have been lost without some such expedient for their preservation, communicated by a subterranean avenue with the king's palace; but at the destruction of Jerusalem the entrance having been closed by the rubbish of falling buildings, it had been discovered by the appearance of a keystone amongst the foundations of the sanctum sanctorum. A careful inspection was then made, and the invaluable secrets were placed in safe custody."

To support this legend, there is no historical evidence and no authority except that of the Talmudic writers. It is clearly a mythical symbol, and as such we must accept it. We cannot altogether reject it, because it is so intimately and so extensively connected with the symbolism of the Lost and the Recovered Word, that if we reject the theory of the Secret Vault, we must abandon all of that symbolism, and with it the whole of the science of Masonic symbolism. Fortunately, there is ample evidence in the present appearance of Jerusalem and its subterranean topography, to remove from any tacit and, as it were, conventional assent to the theory, features of absurdity or impossibility.

Considered simply as a historical question, there can be no doubt of the existence of immense vaults beneath the superstructure of the original Temple of Solomon. Prime, Robison, and other writers who in recent times have described the topography of Jerusalem, speak of the existence of these structures, which they visited and, in some instances, carefully examined.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the Roman Emperor Hadrian erected on the site of the "House of the Lord" a temple of Venus, which in its turn was destroyed, and the place subsequently became a depository of all manner of filth. But the Caliph Omar, after his conquest of Jerusalem, sought out the ancient site, and, having caused it to be cleansed of its impurities, he directed a mosque to be erected on the rock which rises in the centre of the mountain. Fifty years afterward the Sultan Abd-el-Meluk displaced the edifice of Omar, and erected that splendid building which remains to this day, and is still incorrectly called by Christians the mosque of Omar, but known to Mussulmans as El-kubbet-es-Sukrah, or the Dome of the Rock. This is supposed to occupy the exact site of the original Solomonic Temple, and is viewed with equal reverence by Jews and Mohammedans, the former of whom, says Mr. Prime, (Tent Life in the Holy Land, p. 183,) "have a faith that the ark is within its bosom now."

Bartlett, (Walks about Jerusalem, p. 170,) in describing a vault beneath this mosque of Omar, says: "Beneath the dome, at the south-east angle of the Temple wall, conspicuous from all points, is a small subterranean place of prayer, forming the entrance to the extensive vaults which support the level platform of the mosque above."

Dr. Barclay (City of the Great King) describes, in many places of his interesting topography of Jerusalem, the vaults and subterranean chambers which are to be found beneath the site of the old Temple.

Conformable with this historical account is the Talmudical legend, in which the Jewish Rabbins state that, in preparing the foundations of the Temple, the workmen discovered a subterranean vault sustained by seven arches, rising from as many pairs of pillars. This vault escaped notice at the destruction of Jerusalem, in consequence of its being filled with rubbish. The legend adds that Josiah, foreseeing the destruction of the Temple, commanded the Levites to deposit the ark of the covenant in this vault, where it was found by some of the workmen of Zerubbabel at the building of the second Temple.

In the earliest ages, the cave or vault was deemed sacred. The first worship was in cave temples, which were either natural or formed by art to resemble the excavations of nature. Of such great extent was this practice of subterranean worship by the nations of antiquity, that many of the forms of heathen temples, as well as the naves, aisles, and chancels of churches subsequently built for Christian worship, are said to owe their origin to the religious use of caves.

From this, too, arose the fact, that the initiation into the ancient mysteries was almost always performed in subterranean edifices; and when the place of initiation, as in some of the Egyptian temples, was really above ground, it was so constructed as to give to the neophyte the appearance, in its approaches and its internal structure, of a vault. As the great doctrine taught in the mysteries was the resurrection from the dead,—as to die and to be initiated were synonymous terms,—it was deemed proper that there should be some formal resemblance between a descent into the grave and a descent into the place of initiation. "Happy is the man," says the Greek poet Pindar, "who descends beneath the hollow earth having beheld these mysteries, for he knows the end as well as the divine origin of life;" and in a like spirit Sophocles exclaims, "Thrice happy are they who descend to the shades below after having beheld these sacred rites, for they alone have life in Hades, while all others suffer there every kind of evil."

The vault was, therefore, in the ancient mysteries, symbolic of the grave; for initiation was symbolic of death, where alone Divine Truth is to be found. The Masons have adopted the same idea. They teach that death is but the beginning of life; that if the first or evanescent temple of our transitory life be on the surface, we must descend into the secret vault of death before we can find that sacred deposit of truth which is to adorn our second temple of eternal life. It is in this sense of an entrance through the grave into eternal life that we are to view the symbolism of the secret vault. Like every other myth and allegory of Masonry, the historical relation may be true or it may be false; it may be founded on fact or be the invention of imagination; the lesson is still there, and the symbolism teaches it exclusive of the history.

Vedas. The most ancient of the religious writings of the Indian Aryans, and now constituting the sacred canon of the Hindus, being to them what the Bible is to the Christians, or the Koran to the Mohammedans. The word Veda denotes in Sanscrit, the language in which these books are written, wisdom or knowledge, and comes from the verb Veda, which, like the Greek Oida, Foida, signifies "I know." The German weiss and the English wit came from the same root. There are four collections, each of which is called a Veda, namely, the Rig-Veda, the Yajur-Veda, the Sama-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda; but the first only is the real Veda, the others being but commentaries on it, as the Talmud is upon the Old Testament.

The Rig-Veda is divided into two parts: the Mantras or hymns, which are all metrical, and the Brahmanes, which are in prose, and consist of ritualistic directions concerning the employment of the hymns, and the method of sacrifice. The other Vedas consist also of hymns and prayers; but they are borrowed, for the most part, from the Rig-Veda.

The Vedas, then, are the Hindu canon of Scripture—his book of the law; and to the Hindu Mason they are his trestle-board, just as the Bible is to the Christian Mason.

The religion of the Vedas is apparently an adoration of the visible powers of nature, such as the sun, the sky, the dawn, and the fire, and, in general, the eternal powers of light. The supreme divinity was the sky, called Varuna, whence the Greeks got their Ouranos; and next was the Sun, called sometimes Savitar, the progenitor, and sometimes Mitra, the loving one, whence the Persian Mithras. Side by side with these was Agni, fire, whence the Latin ignis, who was the divinity coming most directly in approximation with man on earth, and soaring upwards as the flame to the heavenly gods. But in this nature-worship the Vedas frequently betray an inward spirit groping after the infinite and the eternal, and an anxious search for the divine name, which was to be revered just as the Hebrew aspired after the unutterable Tetragrammaton. Bunsen (God in History, b. iii., ch. 7,) calls this "the desire—the yearning after the nameless Deity, who nowhere manifests himself in the Indian pantheon of the Vedas—the voice of humanity groping after God." One of the most sublime of the Veda hymns (Rig-Veda, b. x. hymn 121) ends each strophe with the solemn question: "Who is the god to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?" This is the question which every religion asks; the search after the All-Father is the labor of all men who are seeking divine truth and light. The Semitic, like the Aryan poet in the same longing spirit for the knowledge of God, exclaims, "Oh that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his seat." It is the great object of all Masonic labor, which thus shows its true religious character and design.

The Vedas have not exercised any direct influence on the symbolism of Freemasonry. But, as the oldest Aryan faith, they became infused into the subsequent religious systems of the race, and through the Zend-Avesta of the Zoroastrians, the mysteries of Mithras, the doctrines of the Neo-platonists, and the school of Pythagoras, mixed with the Semitic doctrines of the Bible and the Talmud, they have cropped out in the mysticism of the Gnostics and the secret societies of the Middle Ages, and have shown some of their spirit in the religious philosophy and the symbolism of Speculative Masonry. To the Masonic scholar, the study of the Vedic hymns is therefore interesting, and not altogether fruitless in its results. The writings of Bunsen, of Muir, of Cox, and especially of Max Müller, will furnish ample materials for the study.

Veils, Grand Masters of the. Three officers in a Royal Arch Chapter of the American Rite, whose duty it is to protect and defend the Veils of the Tabernacle, for which purpose they are presented with a sword. The jewel of their office is a sword within a triangle, and they bear each a banner, which is respectively blue, purple, and scarlet. The title of "Grand Master" appears to be a misnomer. It would have been better to have styled them "Masters" or "Guardians." In the English system, the three Sojourners act in this capacity, which is an absurd violation of all the facts of history, and completely changes the symbolism.

Veils, Symbolism of the. Neither the construction nor the symbolism of the veils in the Royal Arch tabernacle is derived from that of the Sinaitic. In the Sinaitic tabernacle there were no veils of separation between the different parts, except the one white one that hung before the most holy place. The decorations of the tabernacle were curtains, like modern tapestry, interwoven with many colors; no curtain being wholly of one color, and not running across the apartment, but covering its sides and roof. The exterior form of the Royal Arch tabernacle was taken from that of Moses, but the interior decoration from a passage of Josephus not properly understood.

Josephus has been greatly used by the fabricators of high degrees of Masonry, not only for their ideas of symbolism, but for the suggestion of their legends. In the Second Book of Chronicles (iii. 14), it is said that Solomon "made the veil of blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, and wrought cherubims thereon." This description evidently alludes to the single veil, which, like that of the Sinaitic tabernacle, was placed before the entrance of the holy of holies. It by no means resembles the four separate and equidistant veils of the Masonic tabernacle.

But Josephus had said (Antiq., l. viii., c. iii., § 3), that the king "also had veils of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and the brightest and softest linen, with the most curious flowers wrought upon them, which were to be drawn before these doors." To this description—which is a very inaccurate one, which refers, too, to the interior of the first Temple, and not to the supposed tabernacle subsequently erected near its ruins, and which, besides, has no biblical authority for its support—we must trace the ideas, even as to the order of the veils, which the inventors of the Masonic tabernacle adopted in their construction of it. That tabernacle cannot be recognized as historically correct, but must be considered, like the three doors of the Temple in the symbolic degrees, simply as a symbol. But this does not at all diminish its value.

The symbolism of the veils must be considered in two aspects; first, in reference to the symbolism of the veils as a whole, and next, as to the symbolism of each veil separately.

As a whole, the four veils, constituting four divisions of the tabernacle, present obstacles to the neophyte in his advance to the most holy place where the Grand Council sits. Now he is seeking to advance to that sacred spot that he may there receive his spiritual illumination, and be invested with a knowledge of the true Divine name. But Masonically, this Divine name is itself but a symbol of Truth, the object, as has been often said, of all a Mason's search and labor. The passage through the veils is, therefore, a symbol of the trials and difficulties that are encountered and must be overcome in the search for and the acquisition of Truth.

This is the general symbolism; but we lose sight of it, in a great degree, when we come to the interpretation of the symbolism of each veil independently of the others, for this principally symbolizes the various virtues and affections that should characterize the Mason. Yet the two symbolisms are really connected, for the virtues symbolized are those which should distinguish every one engaged in the Divine search.

The symbolism, according to the system adopted in the American Rite, refers to the colors of the veils and to the miraculous signs of Moses, which are described in Exodus as having been shown by him to prove his mission as the messenger of Jehovah.

Blue is a symbol of universal friendship and benevolence. It is the appropriate color of the symbolic degrees, the possession of which is the first step in the progress of the search for truth to be now instituted. The Mosaic sign of the serpent was the symbol among the ancients of resurrection to life, because the serpent, by casting his skin, is supposed continually to renew his youth. It is the symbol here of the loss and the recovery of the Word.

Purple is a symbol here of union, and refers to the intimate connection of Ancient Craft and Royal Arch Masonry. Hence it is the appropriate color of the intermediate degrees, which must be passed through in the prosecution of the search. The Mosaic sign refers to the restoration of the leprous hand to health. Here again, in this representation of a diseased limb restored to health, we have a repetition of the allusion to the loss and the recovery of the Word; the Word itself being but a symbol of Divine truth, the search for which constitutes the whole science of Freemasonry, and the symbolism of which pervades the whole system of initiation from the first to the last degree.

Scarlet is a symbol of fervency and zeal, and is appropriated to the Royal Arch degree because it is by these qualities that the neophyte, now so far advanced in his progress, must expect to be successful in his search. The Mosaic sign of changing water into wine bears the same symbolic reference to a change for the better—from a lower to a higher state—from the elemental water in which there is no life to the blood which is the life itself—from darkness to light. The progress is still onward to the recovery of that which had been lost, but which is yet to be found.

White is a symbol of purity, and is peculiarly appropriate to remind the neophyte, who is now almost at the close of his search, that it is only by purity of life that he can expect to be found worthy of the reception of divine truth. "Blessed," says the Great Teacher, "are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The Mosaic signs now cease, for they have taught their lesson; and the aspirant is invested with the Signet of Truth, to assure him that, having endured all trials and overcome all obstacles, he is at length entitled to receive the reward for which he has been seeking; for the Signet of Zerubbabel is a royal signet, which confers power and authority on him who possesses it.

And so we now see that the Symbolism of the Veils, however viewed, whether collectively or separately, represent the laborious, but at last successful, search for divine truth.

Venerable. The title of a Worshipful Master in a French Lodge.

Venerable Grand Master of all Symbolic Lodges. The twentieth degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. See Grand Master of all Symbolic Lodges. The Dictionnaire Maçonnique says that this degree was formerly conferred on those brethren in France who, in receiving it, obtained the right to organize Lodges, and to act as Masters or Venerables for life, an abuse that was subsequently abolished by the Grand Orient. Ragon and Vassal both make the same statement. It may be true, but they furnish no documentary evidence of the fact. An examination of an old MS. French ritual of the degree, when it formed part of the Rite of Perfection, which is in my possession, shows nothing in the catechism that renders this theory of its origin improbable.

Venerable, Perfect. (Venerable Parfait.) A degree in the collection of Viany.

Venezuela. Freemasonry first penetrated into Venezuela in the beginning of the present century, when a Lodge was instituted by the Grand Orient of Spain. Several other Lodges were subsequently established by the same authority. In 1825, Cerneau, the head of the irregular Supreme Council at New York, established in Caracas a Grand Lodge and Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite. In 1827, the Liberator, Simon Bolivar, having by his decree prohibited all secret societies, the Masonic Lodges, with the exception of the one at Porto Cabello, suspended their labors. In 1830, Venezuela having become independent by the division of the Colombian Republic, several brethren obtained from some of the dignitaries of the extinct Grand Lodge, in their capacity as Sovereign Inspectors General of the thirty-third degree, a temporary Dispensation to hold a Lodge for one year, in the expectation that they would, in the course of that time, be enabled to obtain a Charter from some foreign Grand Lodge. But their efforts, in consequence of irregularities, were unsuccessful, and the Lodge was suspended. For eight years, Freemasonry in Venezuela was in a dormant condition. But in 1838 the Masonic spirit was revived, the Lodge just referred to renewed its labors, the old Lodges were resuscitated, and the National Grand Lodge of Venezuela was constituted, whether regularly or not, it is impossible at this time, with the insufficient light before us, to determine. It was, however, recognized by several foreign bodies. The Grand Lodge thus established, issued Charters to all the old Lodges, and erected new ones. In conjunction with the Inspectors General, it established a supreme legislative body, under the name of the Grand Orient, and also constituted a Grand Lodge, which continued to exist, with only a few changes, made in 1852, until the present Grand Lodge and Supreme Council were established, January 12, 1865. There are at present in Venezuela a Grand Lodge, which, in 1870, had thirty-two Lodges under its obedience, and a Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite.

Vengeance. A word used in the high degrees. Barruel, Robison, and the other detractors of Freemasonry, have sought to find in this word a proof of the vindictive character of the Institution. "In the degree of Kadosh," says Barruel, (Memoires, ii. 310,) "the assassin of Adoniram becomes the king, who must be slain to avenge the Grand Master Molay and the Order of Masons, who are the successors of the Templars."

No calumny was ever fabricated with so little pretension to truth for its foundation. The reference is altogether historical; it is the record of the punishment which followed a crime, not an incentive to revenge.

The word nekam is used in Masonry in precisely the same sense in which it is employed by the prophet Jeremiah (l. 15) when he speaks of nikemat Jehovah, "the vengeance of the Lord," — the punishment which God will inflict on evil-doers. The word is used symbolically to express the universally recognized doctrine that crime will inevitably be followed by its penal consequences. It is the dogma of all true religions; for if virtue and vice entailed the same result, there would be no incentive to the one and no restraint from the other.

Verger. An officer in a Council of Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, whose duties are similar to those of a Senior Deacon in a Symbolic Lodge.

Vermont. Freemasonry was introduced into the State of Vermont in 1781, in which year the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts granted a Charter for the establishment of a Lodge at Cornish. This town having soon afterwards been claimed by New Hampshire, the Lodge removed to Windsor, on the opposite side of the river. In 1785, the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts chartered another Lodge at the town of Manchester. A Grand Lodge was organized October 19, 1794, at Rutland. I have been unable to find any record of the number of Lodges that were engaged in that organization, nor is there any evidence that there were at that time in existence in Vermont any other than the two which had been chartered by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.

In no State of the Union did the anti-Masonic party, as a political power, exercise so much influence as it did in Vermont. The Grand Lodge was, under the pressure of persecution, compelled to suspend its labors in 1833. All the Lodges under its jurisdiction surrendered their Charters, and Masonry for fifteen years had no active existence in that State. The Grand Lodge, however, did not dissolve, but continued its legal life by regular, although private, communications of the officers, and by adjournments, until the year 1846, when it resumed vigor, Bro. Nathan B. Haswell, who was the Grand Master at the time of the suspension, having taken the chair at the resumed communication in January, 1846. The regularity of this resumption, although at first denied by the Grand Lodge of New York, was generally admitted by all the Grand Lodges of the United States, with a welcome to which the devotion and steady perseverance of the Masons of Vermont had justly entitled them.

The Grand Chapter was organized December 20, 1804, Jonathan Wells being elected first Grand High Priest. It shared the destinies of the Grand Lodge during the period of persecution, but was reorganized July 18, 1849, under a commission from Joseph K. Stapleton, Deputy General Grand High Priest of the United States.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was organized August 19, 1854, by a Convention of four Councils held at Vergennes, and Nathan B. Haswell was elected Grand Master.

The Grand Encampment (now the Grand Commandery) was originally organized in 1825. It subsequently became dormant. In 1850, the Grand Encampment was revived; but it appearing that the revival was attended by irregularities, and in violation of the Grand Constitution of the Grand Encampment of the United States, the members dissolved the body, and the Deputy Grand Master, William H. Ellis, having, in December, 1850, issued a commission to three subordinate Encampments to organize a Grand Encampment, that body was formed January 14, 1852.

Vernhes, J. F. A French littérateur and Masonic writer, who was in 1821 the Venerable of the Lodge la Parfaite Humanité at Montpellier. He wrote an Essai sur l'Histoire de la Franche-Maçonnerie, depuis son établissement jusqu'à nos jours, Paris, 1813; and Le Parfait Maçon ou Répertoire complet de la Maçonnerie Symbolique. This work was published at Montpellier, in 1820, in six numbers, of which the sixth was republished the next year, with the title of Apologie des Maçons. It contained a calm and rational refutation of several works which had been written against Freemasonry. Vernhes became an active disciple of the Rite of Mizraim, and published in 1822, at Paris, a defence of it and an examination of the various Rites then practised in France.

Vertot d'Aubœuf, René-Aubert de. The Abbé Vertot was born at the Chateau de Bannelot, in Normandy, in 1665. In 1715 the Grand Master of the Knights of Malta appointed him the historiographer of that Order, and provided him with the Commandery of Santenay. Vertot discharged the duties of his office by writing his well-known work entitled History of the Knights Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, afterwards Knights of Rhodes, and now Knights of Malta, which was published at Paris, in 1726, in four volumes. It has since passed through a great number of editions, and been translated into many languages. Of this work, to which the Abbé principally owes his fame, although he was also the author of many other histories, French critics complain that the style is languishing, and less pure and natural than that of his other writings. Notwithstanding that it has been the basis of almost all subsequent histories of the Order, the judgment of the literary world is, that it needs exactitude in many of its details, and is too much influenced by the personal prejudices of the author. The Abbé Vertot died in 1735.

Vesica Piscis. The fish was among primitive Christians a symbol of Jesus. (See Fish.) The vesica piscis, signifying literally the air-bladder of a fish, but, as some suppose, being the rough outline of a fish, was adopted as an abbreviated form of that symbol. In some old manuscripts it is used as a representation of the lateral wound of our Lord. As a symbol, it was frequently employed as a church decoration by the Freemasons of the Middle Ages. The seals of all colleges, abbeys, and other religious communities, as well as of ecclesiastical persons, were invariably made of this shape. Hence, in reference to the religious character of the Institution, it has been suggested that the seals of Masonic Lodges should also have that form, instead of the circular one now used.

Vexillum Belli. A war-flag. In classical Latin, Vexillum meant a flag consisting of a piece of cloth fixed on a frame or cross-tree, as contradistinguished from a signum, or standard, which was simply a pole with the image of an eagle, horse, or some other device on the top. Among the pretended relics of the Order of the Temple is one called "le drapeau de guerre, eu laine blanche, à quatre raies noires;" i. e., the standard of war, of white linen, with four black rays; and in the statutes of the Order, the Vexillum Belli is described as being "albo nigroque palatum," or pales of white and black, which is the same thing couched in the technical language of heraldry. This is incorrect. The only war-flag of the ancient Knights Templars was the Beauseant. Addison, on the title-page of his Temple Church, gives what he calls "the war-banner of the Order of the Temple," and which is, as in the margin, the Beauseant, bearing in the centre the blood-red Templar cross. Some of the Masonic Templars, those of Scotland, for example, have both a Beaucenifer or Beauseant bearer, and a bearer of the Vexillum Belli. The difference would appear to be that the Beauseant is the plain white and black flag, and the Vexillum

Viany, Auguste de. A Masonic writer of Tuscany, and one of the founders there of the Philosophic Scottish Rite. He was the author of many discourses, dissertations, and didactic essays on Masonic subjects. He is, however, best known as the collector of a large number of manuscript degrees and cahiers or rituals, several of which have been referred to in this work.

Vielle-Bru, Rite of. In 1748, the year after the creation of the Chapter of Arras by the Young Pretender, Charles Edward, a new Rite, in favor of the cause of the Stuarts, was established at Toulouse by, as it is said, Sir Samuel Lockhart, one of the aides-de-camp of the Prince. It was called the Rite of Vielle-Bru, or Faithful Scottish Masons. It consisted of nine degrees, divided into three chapters as follows: First Chapter, 1, 2, 3. The symbolic degrees; 4. Secret Master. Second Chapter, 5, 6, 7, 8. Four élu degrees, based on the Templar system. Third Chapter, 9. Scientific Masonry. The head of the Rite was a Council of Menatzchim. In 1804 the Rite was refused a recognition by the Grand Orient of France, because it presented no moral or scientific object, and because the Charter which it claimed to have from Prince Charles Edward was not proved to be authentic. It continued to exist in the south of France until the year 1812, when, being again rejected by the Grand Orient, it fell into decay.

Villars, Abbé Montfaucon de. He was born in Languedoc in 1653, and was shot by one of his relatives, on the high road between Lyons and Paris, in 1675. The Abbé Villars is celebrated as the author of The Count de Gabalis, or Conversations on the Secret Sciences, published in 2 vols., at Paris, in 1670. In this work the author's design was, under the form of a romance, to unveil some of the Kabbalistic mysteries of Rosicrucianism. It has passed through many editions, and has been translated into English as well as into other languages.

Vincere aut Mori. French, Vaincre ou Mourir, to conquer or to die. The motto of the degree of Perfect Elect Mason, the first of the élus according to the Clermont or Templar system of Masonry.

Vinton, David. A distinguished lecturer on Masonry, and teacher of the ritual in the first quarter of the present century. His field of labors was principally confined to the Southern States, and he taught his system for some time with great success in North and South Carolina. There were, however, stains upon his character, and he was eventually expelled by, I think, the Grand Lodge of the former State. He died at Shakertown, Kentucky, in July, 1833. Vinton published at Dedham, Massachusetts, in 1816, a volume, containing Selections of Masonic, Sentimental, and Humorous songs, under the title of The Masonic Minstrel. Of this rather trifling work no less than twelve thousand copies were sold by subscription. To Vinton's poetic genius we are indebted for that beautiful dirge commencing, "Solemn strikes the funeral chime," which has now become in almost all the Lodges of the United States a part of the ritualistic ceremonies of the third degree, and has been sung over the graves of thousands of departed brethren. This contribution should preserve the memory of Vinton among the Craft, and in some measure atone for his faults, whatever they may have been.

Violet. This is not a Masonic color, except in some of the high degrees of the Scottish Rite, where it is a symbol of mourning, and thus becomes one of the decorations of a Sorrow Lodge. Portal (Coleurs Symboliques, p. 236,) says that this color was adopted for mourning by persons of high rank. And Campini (Vetere Monumenta) states that violet was the mark of grief, especially among kings and cardinals. In Christian art, the Saviour is clothed in a purple robe during his passion; and it is the color appropriated, says Court de Gebelin, (Monde prim., viii. 201,) to martyrs, because, like their divine Master, they undergo the punishment of the passion. Prevost (Hist. des Voyages, vi. 152,) says that in China violet is the color of mourning. Among that people blue is appropriated to the dead and red to the living, because with them red represents the vital heat, and blue, immortality; and hence, says Portal, violet, which is made by an equal admixture of blue and red, is a symbol of the resurrection to eternal life. Such an idea is peculiarly appropriate to the use of violet in the high degrees of Masonry as a symbol of mourning. It would be equally appropriate in the primary degrees, for everywhere in Masonry we are taught to mourn not as those who have no hope. Our grief for the dead is that of those who believe in the immortal life. The red symbol of life is tinged with the blue of immortality, and thus we would wear the violet as our mourning to declare our trust in the resurrection.

Virginia. There is much obscurity about the early history of Freemasonry in this State. The first chartered Lodge appears to have been the "St. John's Lodge" at Norfolk, which received its Warrant in 1741 from the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

December 22, 1758, the "Royal Exchange Lodge" at Norfolk was chartered by the Athol or Ancient York Lodge. But between 1741 and 1758 the Lodge of Fredericksburg had sprung into existence, for its records show that General Washington was there initiated November 4, 1752. This Lodge was chartered by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts on July 21, 1758, but had been acting under Dispensation for several years before. In 1777 there were ten Lodges in Virginia, namely, two at Norfolk and one at each of the following places: Port Royal, Fredericksburg, Hampton, Williamsburg, Gloucester, Cabin Point, Petersburg, and Yorktown. On the 6th of May in that year, deputies from five of these Lodges met in convention at Williamsburg, "for the purpose of choosing a Grand Master for Virginia." So says the record as contained in Dove's Text-Book. The convention, however, adjourned to June 23, after stating its reasons for the election of such an officer. On that day it met, but again adjourned. Finally, it met on October 13, 1778. The record calls it "a Convention of the Craft;" but it assumed the form of a Lodge, and the Master and Wardens of Williamsburg Lodge presided. Only four Lodges were represented, namely, Williamsburg, Blandford, Botetourt, and Cabin Point. The modern forms of Masonic conventions are not found in the proceedings of this convention. Nothing is said of the formation of a Grand Lodge, but the following resolution was adopted:

"It is the opinion of this Convention, that it is agreeable to the Constitutions of Masonry that all the regular chartered Lodges within this State should be subject to the Grand Master of the said State."

Accordingly, John Blair, Past Master of the Williamsburg Lodge, was nominated and unanimously elected, and on the same day he was installed, by the Master of Williamsburg Lodge, as "Grand Master of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Virginia." All this was done, if we may trust the record, in Williamsburg Lodge, the Master thereof presiding, who afterwards closed the Lodge without any reference to the organization of a Grand Lodge. We may, however, imply that such a body was then formed, for Dove—without, however, giving any account of the proceedings in the interval, when there might or might not have been quarterly or annual communications—says that a Grand Lodge was held in the city of Richmond, October 4, 1784, when Grand Master Blair having resigned the chair, James Mercer was elected Grand Master. Dove dates the organization of the Grand Lodge at October 13, 1778.

Royal Arch Masonry was introduced into Virginia, it is said, by Joseph Myers, who was acting under his authority as a Deputy Inspector of the Scottish Rite. The Grand Chapter was organized at Norfolk, May 1, 1808. It has never recognized the authority of the General Grand Chapter.

The Cryptic degrees are conferred in Virginia in the Chapters preparatory to the Royal Arch. There are therefore no Councils of Royal and Select Masters in the State.

The register, or roll published in the Proceedings of the Grand Encampment of the United States for 1871, (p. 27,) states that the Grand Commandery of Virginia was organized, November 27, 1823. But from a report of the committee of the Grand Encampment, made September 17, 1847, we learn the following facts. In 1824 there existed three subordinate Encampments in Virginia, which about the year 1826 formed a Grand Encampment, that was represented that year in the General Grand Encampment. It is supposed that this body ceased to exist soon after its organization, and a Charter was granted, by the General Grand Encampment, for an Encampment to meet at Wheeling. On December 11, 1845, delegates from various Encampments in Virginia met at Richmond and organized a new Grand Encampment which they declared to be independent of the General Grand Encampment. At the session of the latter body in 1847, it declared this new Grand Encampment to be "irregular and unauthorized," and it refused to recognize it or its subordinates. Wheeling Encampment, however, was acknowledged to be a lawful body, as it had not given its adhesion to the irregular Grand Encampment. In January, 1851, the Grand Encampment of Virginia receded from its position of independence, and was recognized by the General Grand Encampment as one of its constituents. It so remained until 1861, when the Grand Commandery (the title which had been adopted in 1859) seceded from the Grand Encampment in consequence of the civil war. It, however, returned to its allegiance in 1865, and has ever since remained a regular portion of the Templar Order of the United States.

Virgin, Weeping. See Weeping Virgin.

Visible Masonry. In a circular published March 18, 1775, by the Grand Orient of France, reference is made to two divisions of the Order, namely, Visible and Invisible Masonry. Did we not know something of the Masonic contentions then existing in France between the Lodges and the supreme authority, we should hardly comprehend the meaning intended to be conveyed by these words. By "Invisible Masonry" they denoted that body of intelligent and virtuous Masons who, irrespective of any connection with dogmatic authorities, constituted "a Mysterious and Invisible Society of the True Sons of Light," who, scattered over the two hemispheres, were engaged, with one heart and soul, in doing everything for the glory of the Grand Architect and the good of their fellow-men. By "Visible Masonry" they meant the congregation of Masons into Lodges, which were often affected by the contagious vices of the age in which they lived. The former is perfect; the latter continually needs purification. The words were originally invented to effect a particular purpose, and to bring the recusant Lodges of France into their obedience. But they might be advantageously preserved, in the technical language of Masonry, for a more general and permanent object. Invisible Masonry would then indicate the abstract spirit of Masonry as it has always existed, while Visible Masonry would refer to the concrete form which it assumes in Lodge and Chapter organizations, and in different Rites and systems. The latter would be like the material church, or church militant; the former like the spiritual church, or church triumphant. Such terms might be found convenient to Masonic scholars and writers.

Visitation, Grand. The visit of a Grand Master, accompanied by his Grand Officers, to a subordinate Lodge, to inspect its condition, is called a Grand Visitation. There is no allusion to anything of the kind in the Old Constitutions, because there was no organization of the Order before the eighteenth century that made such an inspection necessary. But immediately after the revival in 1717, it was found expedient, in consequence of the growth of Lodges in London, to provide for some form of visitation and inspection. So, in the very first of the Thirty-nine General Regulations, adopted in 1721, it is declared that "the Grand Master or his Deputy hath authority and right not only to be present in any true Lodge, but also to preside wherever he is, with the Master of the Lodge on his left hand, and to order his Grand Wardens to attend him, who are not to act in any particular Lodges as Wardens, but in his presence and at his command; because there the Grand Master may command the Wardens of that Lodge, or any other brethren he pleaseth, to attend and act as his Wardens pro tempore."

In compliance with this old regulation, whenever the Grand Master, accompanied by his Wardens and other officers, visits a Lodge in his jurisdiction, for the purpose of inspecting its condition, the Master and officers of the Lodge thus visited surrender their seats to the Grand Master and the Grand Officers.

Grand Visitations are among the oldest usages of Freemasonry since the revival period. In this country they are not now so frequently practised, in consequence of the extensive territory over which the Lodges are scattered, and the difficulty of collecting at one point all the Grand Officers, many of whom generally reside at great distances apart. Still, where it can be done, the practice of Grand Visitations should never be neglected.

The power of visitation for inspection is confined to the Grand and Deputy Grand Master. The Grand Wardens possess no such prerogative. The Master must always tender the gavel and the chair to the Grand or Deputy Grand Master when either of them informally visits a Lodge; for the Grand Master and, in his absence, the Deputy have the right to preside in all Lodges where they may be present. But this privilege does not extend to the Grand Wardens.

Visiting Brethren. Every brother from abroad, or from any other Lodge, when he visits a Lodge, must be received with welcome and treated with hospitality. He must be clothed, that is to say, furnished with an apron, and, if the Lodge uses them, (as every Lodge should,) with gloves, and, if a Past Master, with the jewel of his rank. He must be directed to a seat, and the utmost courtesy extended to him. If of distinguished rank in the Order, the honors due to that rank must be paid to him.

This hospitable and courteous spirit is derived from the ancient customs of the Craft, and is inculcated in all the Old Constitutions. Thus, in the Stone MS., it is directed "that every Mason receive and cherish strange fellows when they come over the countrie, and sett them on worke, if they will worke, as the manner is; that is to say, if the Mason have any mould stone in his place, he shall give him a mould stone, and sett him on worke; and if he have none, the Mason shall refresh him with money unto the next Lodge." A similar regulation is found in all the other manuscripts of the Operative Masons; and from them the usage has descended to their speculative successors.

At all Lodge banquets it is of obligation that a toast shall be drunk "to the visiting brethren." To neglect this would be a great breach of decorum.

Visit, Right of. Every affiliated Mason in good standing has a right to visit any other Lodge, wherever it may be, as often as it may suit his pleasure or convenience; and this is called, in Masonic law, "the right of visit." It is one of the most important of all Masonic privileges, because it is based on the principle of the identity of the Masonic institution as one universal family, and is the exponent of that well-known maxim that "in every clime a Mason may find a home, and in every land a brother." It has been so long and so universally admitted, that I have not hesitated to rank it among the landmarks of the Order.

The admitted doctrine on this subject is, that the right of visit is one of the positive rights of every Mason, because Lodges are justly considered as only divisions for convenience of the universal Masonic family. The right may, of course, be lost, or forfeited on special occasions, by various circumstances; but any Master who shall refuse admission to a Mason in good standing, who knocks at the door of his Lodge, is expected to furnish some good and satisfactory reason for his thus violating a Masonic right. If the admission of the applicant, whether a member or visitor, would, in his opinion, be attended with injurious consequences, such, for instance, as impairing the harmony of the Lodge, a Master would then, I presume, be justified in refusing admission. But without the existence of some such good reason, Masonic jurists have always decided that the right of visitation is absolute and positive, and inures to every Mason in his travels throughout the world. See this subject discussed in its fullest extent in the author's Text Book of Masonic Jurisprudence, pp. 203-216.

Vivat. "Vivat! vivat! vivat!" is the acclamation which accompanies the honors in the French Rite. Bazot (Manuel, p. 165,) says it is "the cry of joy of Freemasons of the French Rite." Vivat is a Latin word, and signifies, literally, "May he live;" but it has been domiciliated in French, and Boiste (Dictionnaire Universel) defines it as "a cry of applause which expresses the wish for the preservation of any one." The French Masons say, "He was received with the triple vivat," to denote that "He was received with the highest honors of the Lodge."

Vogel, Paul Joachim Sigismund. A distinguished Masonic writer of Germany, who was born in 1753. He was at one time co-rector of the Sebastian School at Altdorf, and afterwards First Professor of Theology and Ecclesiastical Counsellor at Erlangen. In 1785 he published at Nuremberg, in three volumes, his Briefe, die Freimaurerei betreffend; or, "Letters concerning Freemasonry." The first volume treats of the Knights Templars; the second, of the Ancient Mysteries; and the third, of Freemasonry. This was, says Kloss, the first earnest attempt made in Germany to trace Freemasonry to a true, historical origin. Vogel's theory was, that the Speculative Freemasons were derived from the Operative or Stonemasons of the Middle Ages. The abundant documentary evidence that more recent researches have produced were then wanting, and the views of Vogel did not make that impression to which they were entitled. He has, however, the credit of having opened the way, after the Abbé Grandidier, for those who have followed him in the same field. He also delivered before the Lodges of Nuremberg, several Discourses on the Design, Character, and Origin of Freemasonry, which were published in one volume, at Berlin, in 1791.

Voigt, Friederich. A Doctor of Medicine, and Professor and Senator at Dresden. He was a member of the high degrees of the Rite of Strict Observance, where his Order name was Eques à Falcone, or Knight of the Falcon. In 1788 he attacked Starck's Rite of the Clerks of Strict Observance, and published an essay on the subject, in the year 1788, in the Acta Historico-Ecclesiastica of Weimar. Voigt exposed the Roman Catholic tendencies of the new system, and averred that its object was "to cite and command spirits, to find the philosopher's stone, and to establish the reign of the millennium." His development of the Kabbalistic character of the Rite made a deep impression on the Masonic world, and was one of the most effective attacks upon it made by its antagonists of the old Strict Observance.

Voting. Voting in Lodges viva voce, or by "aye" and "nay," is a modern innovation in this country. During the Grand Mastership of the Earl of Loudon, on April 6, 1736, the Grand Lodge of England, on the motion of Deputy Grand Master Ward, adopted "a new regulation of ten rules for explaining what concerned the decency of assemblies and communications." The tenth of these rules is in the following words:

"The opinions or votes of the members are always to be signified by each holding up one of his hands; which uplifted hands the Grand Wardens are to count, unless the number of hands be so unequal as to render the counting useless. Nor should any other kind of division be ever admitted on such occasions."

The usual mode of putting the question is for the presiding officer to say: "So many as are in favor will signify the same by the usual sign of the Order," and then, when those votes have been counted, to say: "So many as are of a contrary opinion will signify the same by the same sign." The votes are now counted by the Senior Deacon in a subordinate Lodge, and by the Senior Grand Deacon in a Grand Lodge, it having been found inconvenient for the Grand Wardens to perform that duty. The number of votes on each side is communicated by the Deacon to the presiding officer, who announces the result.

The same method of voting should be observed in all Masonic bodies.

Voting, Right of. Formerly, all members of the Craft, even Entered Apprentices, were permitted to vote. This was distinctly prescribed in the last of the Thirty-nine General Regulations adopted in 1721. But the numerical strength of the Order, which was then in the first degree, having now passed over to the third, the modern rule is that the right of voting shall be restricted to Master Masons. A Master Mason may, therefore, speak and vote on all questions, except in trials where he is himself concerned as accuser or defendant. Yet by special regulation of his Lodge he may be prevented from voting on ordinary questions where his dues for a certain period—generally twelve months—have not been paid; and such a regulation exists in almost every Lodge. But no local by-law can deprive a member, who has not been suspended, from voting on the ballot for the admission of candidates, because the sixth regulation of 1721 distinctly requires that each member present on such occasion shall give his consent before the candidate can be admitted. And if a member were deprived by any by-law of the Lodge, in consequence of non-payment of his dues, of the right of expressing his consent or dissent, the ancient regulation would be violated, and a candidate might be admitted without the unanimous consent of all the members present. And this rule is so rigidly enforced, that on a ballot for initiation no member can be excused from voting. He must assume the responsibility of casting his vote, lest it should afterwards be said that the candidate was not admitted by unanimous consent.

Vouching. It is a rule in Masonry, that a Lodge may dispense with the examination of a visitor, if any brother present will vouch that he possesses the necessary qualifications. This is an important prerogative that every Mason is entitled to exercise; and yet it is one which may so materially affect the well-being of the whole Fraternity, since, by its injudicious use, impostors might be introduced among the faithful, that it should be controlled by the most stringent regulations.

To vouch for one is to bear witness for him, and in witnessing to truth, every caution should be observed, lest falsehood may cunningly assume its garb. The brother who vouches should know to a certainty that the one for whom he vouches is really what he claims to be. He should know this, not from a casual conversation, nor a loose and careless inquiry, but from "strict trial, due examination, or lawful information." These are the three requisites which the ritual has laid down as essentially necessary to authorize the act of vouching. Let us inquire into the import of each.

1. Strict Trial. By this is meant that every question is to be asked, and every answer demanded, which is necessary to convince the examiner that the party examined is acquainted with what he ought to know, to entitle him to the appellation of a brother. Nothing is to be taken for granted — categorical answers must be returned to all that it is deemed important to be asked; no forgetfulness is to be excused; nor is the want of memory to be considered as a valid reason for the want of knowledge. The Mason who is so unmindful of his obligations as to have forgotten the instructions he has received, must pay the penalty of his carelessness, and be deprived of his contemplated visit to that society whose secret modes of recognition he has so little valued as not to have treasured them in his memory. The "strict trial" refers to the matter which is sought to be obtained by inquiry; and while there are some things which may safely be passed over in the investigation of one who confesses himself to be "rusty," because they are details which require much study to acquire and constant practice to retain, there are still other things of great importance which must be rigidly demanded.

2. Due examination. If "strict trial" refers to the matter, "due examination" alludes to the mode of investigation. This must be conducted with all the necessary forms and antecedent cautions. Inquiries should be made as to the time and place of initiation as a preliminary step, the Tiler's O.B. of course never being omitted. Then the good old rule of "commencing at the beginning" should be pursued. Let every thing go on in regular course; nor is it to be supposed that the information sought was originally received. Whatever be the suspicions of imposture, let no expression of those suspicions be made until the final decree for rejection is uttered. And let that decree be uttered in general terms, such as, "I am not satisfied," or "I do not recognize you," and not in more specific language, such as, "You did not answer this inquiry," or "You are ignorant on that point." The candidate for examination is only entitled to know that he has not complied generally with the requisitions of his examiner. To descend to particulars is always improper, and often dangerous. Above all, never ask what the lawyers call "leading questions," which include in themselves the answer, nor in any way aid the memory, or prompt the forgetfulness of the party examined, by the slightest hints.

3. Lawful information. This authority for vouching is dependent on what has been already described. For no Mason can lawfully give information of another's qualifications unless he has himself actually tested him. But it is not every Mason who is competent to give "lawful information." Ignorant or unskilful brethren cannot do so, because they are incapable of discovering truth or of detecting error. A "rusty Mason" should never attempt to examine a stranger, and certainly, if he does, his opinion as to the result is worth nothing. If the information given is on the ground that the party who is vouched for has been seen sitting in a Lodge, care must be taken to inquire if it was a "just and legally constituted Lodge of Master Masons." A person may forget from the lapse of time, and vouch for a stranger as a Master Mason, when the Lodge in which he saw him was only opened in the first or second degree. Information given by letter, or through a third party, is irregular. The person giving the information, the one receiving it, and the one of whom it is given, should all be present at the time, for otherwise there would be no certainty of identity. The information must be positive, not founded on belief or opinion, but derived from a legitimate source. And, lastly, it must not have been received casually, but for the very purpose of being used for Masonic purposes. For one to say to another, in the course of a desultory conversation, "A. B. is a Mason," is not sufficient. He may not be speaking with due caution, under the expectation that his words will be considered of weight. He must say something to this effect, "I know this man to be a Master Mason, for such or such reasons, and you may safely recognize him as such." This alone will insure the necessary care and proper observance of prudence.

Lastly, never should an unjustifiable delicacy weaken the rigor of these rules. For the wisest and most evident reasons, that merciful maxim of the law, which says that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be punished, is with us reversed; so that in Masonry it is better that ninety and nine true men should be turned away from the door of a Lodge, than that one cowan should be admitted.

Voyages. The French Masons thus call some of the proofs and trials to which a candidate is subjected in the course of initiation into any of the degrees. In the French Rite, the voyages in the symbolic degrees are three in the first, five in the second, and seven in the third. Their symbolic designs are thus briefly explained by Ragon (Cours des Init., pp. 90, 132,) and Lenoir, (La Franche-Maçonnerie, p. 263:)

The voyages of the Entered Apprentice are now, as they were in the Ancient Mysteries, the symbol of the life of man. Those of the Fellow Craft are emblematic of labor in search of knowledge. Those of the Master Mason are symbolic of the pursuit of crime, the wandering life of the criminal, and his vain attempts to escape remorse and punishment. It will be evident that the ceremonies in all the Rites of Masonry, although under a different name, lead to the same symbolic results.

Wächter, Eberhard, Baron

Von. Lord of the Chamber to the king of Denmark, and Danish Ambassador at Ratisbon; was born in 1747. He was at one time a very active member of the Rite of Strict Observance, where he bore the characteristic name of Eques à ceraso, and had been appointed Chancellor of the German Priors of the 7th Province. When the spiritual schism of the Order made its vast pretensions to a secret authority derived from unknown superiors, whose names they refused to divulge, Von Wächter was sent to Italy by the old Scottish Lodge of which Duke Ferdinand was Grand Master, that he might obtain some information from the Pretender, and from other sources, as to the true character of the Rite. Von Wächter was unsuccessful, and the intelligence which he brought back to Germany was unfavorable to Von Hund, and increased the embarrassments of the Strict Observance Lodges. But he himself lost reputation. A host of enemies attacked him. Some declared that while in Italy he had made a traffic of Masonry to enrich himself; others that he had learned and was practising magic; and others again that he had secretly attached himself to the Jesuits. Von Wächter stoutly denied these charges; but it is certain that, from being in very moderate circumstances, he had, after his return from Italy, become suddenly and unaccountably rich. Yet Mossdorf says that he discharged his mission with great delicacy and judgment. Thory, quoting the Beytrag zur neuesten Geschichte, (p. 150,) says that in 1782 he proposed to give a new organization to the Templar system of Masonry, on the ruins, perhaps, of both branches of the Strict Observance, and declared that he possessed the true secrets of the Order. His proposition for a reform was not accepted by the German Masons, because they suspected that he was an agent of the Jesuits. Kloss (Bibliog., No. 622ⁿ) gives the title of a work published by him in 1822 as Worte der Wahrheit an die Menschen, meine Brüder. He died May 25, 1825, one, perhaps, of the last actors in the great Masonic drama of the Strict Observance.

Wages of a Master Mason, Symbolic. See Foreign Countries.

Wages of Operative Masons.

In all the Old Constitutions praise is given to St. Alban because he raised the wages of the Masons. Thus the Edinburgh-Kilwinning MS. says: "St. Albans loved Masons well, and cherished them much, and made their pay right good, standing by as the realme did, for he gave them iis. a week, and 3d. to their cheer; for before that time, through all the land, a Mason had but a penny a day and his meat, until St. Alban amended it." We may compare this rate of wages in the third century with that of the fifteenth, and we will be surprised at the little advance that was made. In Grosse and Astle's Antiquarian Repertory (iii., p. 58,) will be found an extract from the Roles of Parliament, which contains a petition, in the year 1443, to Parliament to regulate the price of labor. In it are the following items: "And y^e from the Fest of Ester unto Mighelmasse y^e wages of eny free Mason or maister carpenter exceed not by the day iiid., with mete and drynk, and withoute mete and drink vd., ob.

"A Maister Tyler or Sclatter, rough mason and meen carpenter, and other artificers concernyng beldyng, by the day iiid., with mete and drynk, and withoute mete and drynke, iiid., ob.

"And from the Fest of Mighelmasse unto Ester, a free Mason and a maister carpenter by the day iiid., with mete and drynk, withoute mete and drink, iiid., ob.

"Tyler, meen carpenter, rough mason, and other artificers aforesaid, by the day iid., ob, with mete and drynk, withoute mete and drynk iiiiid., and every other werkman and laborer by the day id., ob, with mete and drynk, and withoute mete and drink iiiiid., and who that lasse deserveth, to take lasse."

Wages of the Workmen at the Temple. Neither the Scriptures, nor Josephus, give us any definite statement of the amount of wages paid, nor the manner in which they were paid, to the workmen who were engaged in the erection of King Solomon's Temple. The cost of its construction, however, must have been immense, since it has been estimated that the edifice alone consumed more gold and silver than at present exists upon the whole earth; so that Josephus very justly says that "Solomon made all these things for the honor of God, with great variety and magnificence, sparing no cost, but using all possible liberality in adorning the Temple." We learn, as one instance of this liberality, from the 2d Book of Chronicles, that Solomon paid annually to the Tyrian Masons, the servants of Hiram, "twenty thousand measures of beaten wheat, and twenty thousand measures of barley, and twenty thousand baths of wine, and twenty thousand baths of oil." The bath was a measure equal to seven and a half gallons wine measure; and the cor or chomer, which we translate by the indefinite word measure, contained ten baths; so that the corn, wine, and oil furnished by King Solomon, as wages to the servants of Hiram of Tyre, amounted to one hundred and ninety thousand bushels of the first, and one hundred and fifty thousand gallons each of the second and third. The sacred records do not inform us what further wages they received, but we elsewhere learn that King Solomon gave them as a free gift a sum equal to more than thirty-two millions of dollars. The whole amount of wages paid to the craft is stated to have been about six hundred and seventy-two millions of dollars; but we have no means of knowing how that amount was distributed; though it is natural to suppose that those of the most skill and experience received the highest wages. The Harodim, or chiefs of the workmen, must have been better paid than the Ish Sabal, or mere laborers.

The legend-makers of Masonry have not been idle in their invention of facts and circumstances in relation to this subject, the whole of which have little more for a foundation than the imaginations of the inventors. They form, however, a part of the legendary history of Masonry, and are interesting for their ingenuity, and sometimes even for their absurdity.

There was an old tradition among the English Masons, that the men were paid in their Lodges by shekels,—a silver coin of about the value of fifty cents,—and that the amount was regulated by the square of the number of the degree that the workman had attained. Thus, the Entered Apprentice received one shekel per day; the Fellow Craft, who had advanced to the second degree, received the square of 2, or $2 \times 2 = 4$ shekels; and the Mark Man, or third degree, received the square of 3, or $3 \times 3 = 9$ shekels; whilst the ninth degree, or Super Excellent Mason, received the square of 9, or $9 \times 9 = 81$ shekels.

According to this tradition the pay-roll would be as follows:

	Shekel.
An Entered Apprentice received 1	=	$00 50
A Fellow Craft " 4	=	2 00
A Mark Man " 9	=	4 50
A Mark Master " 16	=	8 00
A Master Mason " 25	=	12 50
An Architect " 36	=	18 00
A Grand Architect " 49	=	24 50
An Excellent Mason " 64	=	32 00
A Super Excellent Mason " 81	=	40 50

But this calculation seems to have been only a fanciful speculation of some of our ancient brethren.

Other traditions give a classification of the workmen as to their classes and the number of men in each class. From this classification, we may estimate the daily expenditure at the Temple, in the article of wages, at the following amount:

	Shekels.	Dollars.
30,000 Entered Apprentices received	30,000 =	15,000
110,600 Fellow Crafts " 4	442,400 =	221,000
2,000 Mark Men " 9	18,000 =	9,000
1,000 Mark Masters " 16	16,000 =	8,000
3,564 Master Masons " 25	89,100 =	44,550
24 Architects " 36	864 =	432
12 Grand Architects " 49	588 =	294
72 Excellent Masons " 64	4,600 =	2,394
9 Super Excellent Masons " 81	729 =	364

Prideaux says that King David had laid up for the building of the Temple immense quantities of gold, silver, copper, iron, and other materials, to the amount of £800,000,000, or in round numbers about four thousand million dollars. Now the daily pay estimated in the preceding roll, which is $276,944, would amount in one year, deducting Sabbaths, to $86,406,528, or, in the seven years occupied in building the Temple, to $604,845,686. A large amount would therefore still remain out of the four thousand millions for other expenses. So that comparing the estimate of the tradition with that of Prideaux, if the latter be true, (which is, however, denied by many commentators,) the former is not incredible. But after all, it is merely a legend founded on a speculation.

These traditions are not now familiarly known, and would perhaps be soon forgotten, were it not that they have been preserved by some of our writers simply as antiquarian relics of the speculations of our brethren of former days.

The traditions in reference to the pay of the Fellow Crafts have been preserved in the ritual of the Mark Master's degree.

According to these traditions, there were two divisions of the Fellow Crafts. The first, or higher class, worked in the quarries, in finishing the stones, or, as we say in our lectures, "in hewing, squaring, and numbering" them; and, that each one might be enabled to designate his own work, he was in possession of a mark which he placed upon the stones prepared by him. Hence, this class of Fellow Crafts were called Mark Masters, and received their pay from the Senior Grand Warden, whom some suppose to have been Adoniram, the brother-in-law of Hiram Abif, and the first of the Provosts and Judges. These Fellow Crafts received their pay in money, at the rate of a half-shekel of silver per day, equal to about twenty-five cents. They were paid weekly, at the sixth hour of the sixth day of the week, that is to say on Friday, at noon. And this hour appears to have been chosen because, as we are taught in the third degree, at noon, or high twelve, the Craft were always called from labor to refreshment, and hence the payment of their wages at that hour would not interfere with or retard the progress of the work.

But there was another, and it is probable a larger, class of Fellow Crafts, younger and more inexperienced men, whose skill and knowledge were not such as to entitle them to advancement to the grade of Mark Masters. These workmen were not, therefore, in possession of a mark. They proved their right to reward by another token, and received their wages in the middle chamber of the Temple, and were paid in corn, wine, and oil, agreeably to the stipulation of King Solomon with Hiram of Tyre.

Of course, it would be a waste of words to attempt to defend the authenticity of these legends. Based on the theory that Freemasonry, as now organized, was existing at the building of the Temple of King Solomon, they pass away with that assumption. There is no countenance of history about them. Parts of them are symbolical, and, as such, of use. Greater portions are merely fanciful speculations, indulged in only to exhibit ingenuity and to test credulity. Dr. Oliver, who is never reluctant to accept a plausible legend, says of the tradition of the wages, that "indeed the probability is that the tradition has been fabricated in a subsequent age without the existence of any document to attest its authenticity."

Wales. Anderson says, in his second edition, that Grand Master Inchiquin granted a Deputation, May 10, 1727, to Hugh Warburton, Esq., to be Provincial Grand Master of North Wales, and another, June 24 in the same year, to Sir Edward Mansel, to be Provincial Grand Master of South Wales; and it is at this period that we may date the introduction of Freemasonry into the principality, for ten years afterwards the same writer says that Lodges were in existence. Wales forms a part of the Masonic obedience of the Grand Lodge of England, and the Fraternity there are directly governed by three Provincial Grand Lodges.

Wands. Oliver, under this title in his Dictionary, refers to the three sceptres which, in the Royal Arch system of England, are placed in a triangular form beneath the canopy in the East, and which, being surmounted respectively by a crown, an All-seeing eye, and a mitre, refer to the regal, the prophetic, and the sacerdotal offices. In his Landmarks he calls them sceptres. But rod or wand is the better word, because, while the sceptre is restricted to the insignia of kings, the rod or wand was and still is used as an indiscriminate mark of authority for all offices.

Wardens. In every Symbolic Lodge, three are three principal officers, namely, a Master, a Senior Warden, and a Junior Warden. This rule has existed ever since the revival, and for some time previous to that event, and is so universal that it has been considered as one of the landmarks. It exists in every country and in every Rite. The titles of the officers may be different in different languages, but their functions, as presiding over the Lodge in a tripartite division of duties, are everywhere the same. The German Masons call the two Wardens erste and zweite Aufseher; the French, premier and second Surveillant; the Spanish, primer and segundo Vigilante; and the Italians, primo and secondo Sorvegliante.

In different Rites, the positions of these officers vary. In the York and American Rites, the Senior Warden sits in the West and the Junior in the South. In the French and Scottish Rites, both Wardens are in the West, the Senior in the North-west and the Junior in the South-west; but in all, the triangular position of the three officers relatively to each other is preserved; for a triangle being formed within the square of the Lodge, the Master and Wardens will each occupy one of the three points.

The precise time when the presidency of the Lodge was divided between these three officers, or when they were first introduced into Masonry, is unknown. The Lodges of Scotland, during the Operative régime, were governed by a Deacon and one Warden. The Deacon performed the functions of a Master, and the Warden was the second officer, and took charge of and distributed the funds. In other words, he acted as a treasurer. This is evident from the minutes of the Edinburgh Lodge, recently published by Bro. Lyon. But the head of the Craft in Scotland at the same time was called the Warden General. This regulation, however, does not appear to have been universal even in Scotland, for in the "Mark Book" of the Aberdeen Lodge, under date of December 27, 1670, which was published by Bro. W. J. Hughan in the Voice of Masonry, (Feb., 1872,) we find there a Master and Warden recognized as the presiding officers of the Lodge in the following statute: "And lykwayse we all protest, by the oath we have made at our entrie, to own the Warden of our Lodge as the next man in power to the Maister, and in the Maister's absence he is full Maister."

Some of the English manuscript Constitutions recognize the offices of Master and Wardens. Thus the Harleian MS., No. 1942, whose date is supposed to be about 1670, contains the "new articles" said to have been agreed on at a General Assembly held in 1663, in which is the following passage: "That for the future the sayd Society, Company and Fraternity of Free Masons shal bee regulated and governed by one Master & Assembly & Wardens, as y^e said Company shall think fit to chose, at every yearly General Assembly."

As the word "Warden" does not appear in the earlier manuscripts, it might be concluded that the office was not introduced into the English Lodges until the latter part of the seventeenth century. Yet this does not absolutely follow. For the office of Warden might have existed, and no statutory provision on the subject have been embraced in the general charges which are contained in those manuscripts, because they relate not to the government of Lodges, but the duties of Masons. This, of course, is conjectural; but the conjecture derives weight from the fact that Wardens were officers of the English gilds as early as the fourteenth century. In the Charters granted by Edward III., in 1354, it is permitted that these companies shall yearly elect for their government "a certain number of Wardens." To a list of the companies of the date of 1377 is affixed what is called the "Oath of the Wardens of Crafts," of which this is the commencement: "Ye shall swere that ye shall wele and treuly oversee the Craft of ——— whereof ye be chosen Wardeyns for the year." It thus appears that the Wardens were at first the presiding officers of the gilds. At a later period, in the reign of Elizabeth, we find that the chief officer began to be called Master; and in the time of James I., between 1603 and 1625, the gilds were generally governed by a Master and Wardens. An ordinance of the Leather-Sellers Company at that time directed that on a certain occasion "the Master and Wardens shall appear in state." It is not, therefore, improbable that the government of Masonic Lodges by a Master and two Wardens was introduced into the regulations of the Order in the seventeenth century, the "new article" of 1663 being a statutory confirmation of a custom which had just begun to prevail.

Senior Warden. He is the second officer in a Symbolic Lodge, and governs the Craft in the hours of labor. In the absence of the Master he presides over the Lodge, appointing some brother, not the Junior Warden, to occupy his place in the west. His jewel is a level, a symbol of the equality which exists among the Craft while at labor in the Lodge. His seat is in the west, and he represents the column of Strength. He has placed before him, and carries in all processions, a column, which is the representative of the right-hand pillar that stood at the porch of King Solomon's Temple. The Junior Warden has a similar column, which represents the left-hand pillar. During labor the column of the Senior Warden is erect in the Lodge, while that of the Junior is recumbent. At refreshment, the position of the two columns is reversed.

Junior Warden. The duties of this officer have already been described. See Junior Warden.

There is also an officer in a Commandery of Knights Templars, the fifth in rank, who is styled "Senior Warden." He takes an important part in the initiation of a candidate. His jewel of office is a triple triangle, the emblem of Deity.

Wardens, Grand. See Grand Wardens.

Warder. The literal meaning of Warder is one who keeps watch and ward. In the Middle Ages, the Warder was stationed at the gate or on the battlements of the castle, and with his trumpet sounded alarms and announced the approach of all comers. Hence the Warder in a Commandery of Knights Templars bears a trumpet, and his duties are prescribed to be to announce the approach and departure of the Eminent Commander, to post the sentinels, and see that the Asylum is duly guarded, as well as to announce the approach of visitors. His jewel is a trumpet and crossed swords engraved on a square plate.

Warlike Instrument. In the ancient initiations, the aspirant was never permitted to enter on the threshold of the Temple in which the ceremonies were conducted until, by the most solemn warning, he had been impressed with the necessity of secrecy and caution. The use, for this purpose, of a "warlike instrument" in the first degree of Masonry, is intended to produce the same effect. A sword has always been employed for that purpose; and the substitute of the point of the compasses, taken from the altar at the time, is an absurd sacrifice of symbolism to the convenience of the Senior Deacon. The compasses are peculiar to the third degree. In the earliest rituals of the last century it is said that the entrance is "upon the point of a sword, or spear, or some warlike instrument." Krause, (Kunsturk., ii. 142,) in commenting on this expression, has completely misinterpreted its signification. He supposes that the sword was intended as a sign of jurisdiction now assumed by the Lodge. But the real object of the ceremony is to teach the neophyte that as the sword or warlike instrument will wound or prick the flesh, so will the betrayal of a trust confided wound or prick the conscience of him who betrays it.

War, Masonry in. The question how Masons should conduct themselves in time of war, when their own country is one of the belligerents, is an important one. Of the political course of a Mason in his individual and private capacity there is no doubt. The Charges declare that he must be "a peaceable subject to the civil powers, and never be concerned in plots and conspiracies against the peace and welfare of the nation." But so anxious is the Order to be unembarrassed by all political influences, that treason, however discountenanced by the Craft, is not held as a crime which is amenable to Masonic punishment. For the same charge affirms that "if a brother should be a rebel against the State, he is not to be countenanced in his rebellion, however he may be pitied as an unhappy man; and if convicted of no other crime, though the loyal brotherhood must and ought to disown his rebellion and give no umbrage or ground of political jealousy to the government for the time being, they cannot expel him from the Lodge, and his relation to it remains indefeasible."

The Mason, then, like every other citizen, should be a patriot. He should love his country with all his heart; should serve it faithfully and cheerfully; obey its laws in peace; and in war should be ever ready to support its honor and defend it from the attacks of its enemies. But even then the benign principles of the Institution extend their influence, and divest the contest of many of its horrors. The Mason fights, of course, like every other man, for victory; but when the victory is won, he will remember that the conquered foe is still his brother.

On the occasion, many years ago, of a Masonic banquet given immediately after the close of the Mexican war to Gen. Quitman by the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, that distinguished soldier and Mason remarked that, although he had devoted much of his attention to the nature and character of the Masonic institution, and had repeatedly held the highest offices in the gift of his brethren, he had never really known what Masonry was until he had seen its workings on the field of battle.

But as a collective and organized body—in its Lodges and its Grand Lodges—it must have nothing to do with war. It must be silent and neutral. The din of the battle, the cry for vengeance, the shout of victory, must never penetrate its portals. Its dogmas and doctrines all teach love and fraternity; its symbols are symbols of peace; and it has no place in any of its rituals consecrated to the inculcation of human contention.

Bro. C. W. Moore, in his Biography of Thomas Smith Webb, the great American ritualist, mentions a circumstance which occurred during the period in which Webb presided over the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island, and to which Moore, I think, inconsiderately has given his hearty commendation.

The United States was at that time engaged in a war with England. The people of Providence having commenced the erection of fortifications, the Grand Lodge volunteered its services; and the members, marching in procession as a Grand Lodge to the southern part of the town, erected a breastwork, to which was given the name of Fort Hiram. I doubt the propriety of the act. While (to repeat what has been just said) every individual member of the Grand Lodge, as a Mason, was bound by his obligation to be "true to his government," and to defend it from the attacks of its enemies, it was, I think, unseemly, and contrary to the peaceful spirit of the Institution, for any organized body of Masons, organized as such, to engage in a warlike enterprise. But the patriotism, if not the prudence of the Grand Lodge, cannot be denied.

Since writing this paragraph, I have met in Bro. Murray Lyon's History of the Lodge of Edinburgh (p. 83) with a record of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, a century ago, which sustains the view that I have taken. In 1777, recruits were being enlisted in Scotland for the British army, which was to fight the Americans in the war of the Revolution, which had just begun. Many of the Scotch Lodges offered, through the newspapers, bounties to all who should enlist. But on February 2, 1778, the Grand Lodge passed a resolution, which was published on the 12th, through the Grand Secretary, in the following circular:

"At a quarterly meeting of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, held here the second instant, I received a charge to acquaint all the Lodges of Scotland holding of the Grand Lodge that the Grand Lodge has seen with concern advertisements in the public newspapers, from different Lodges in Scotland, not only offering a bounty to recruits who may enlist in the new levies, but with the addition that all such recruits shall be admitted to the freedom of Masonry. The first of these they consider as an improper alienation of the funds of the Lodge from the support of their poor and distressed brethren; and the second they regard as a prostitution of our Order, which demands the reprehension of the Grand Lodge. Whatever share the brethren may take as individuals in aiding these levies, out of zeal to serve their private friends or to promote the public service, the Grand Lodge considered it to be repugnant to the spirit of our Craft that any Lodge should take a part in such a business as a collective body. For Masonry is an Order of Peace, and it looks on all mankind to be brethren as Masons, whether they be at peace or at war with each other as subjects of contending countries. The Grand Lodge therefore strongly enjoins that the practice may be forthwith discontinued. By order of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. W. Mason, Gr. Sec."

Of all human institutions, Freemasonry is the greatest and purest Peace Society. And this is because its doctrine of universal peace is founded on the doctrine of a universal brotherhood.

Warrant of Constitution. The document which authorizes or gives a Warrant to certain persons therein named to organize and constitute a Lodge, Chapter, or other Masonic body, and which ends usually with the formula, "for which this shall be your sufficient warrant."

The practice of granting Warrants for the constitution of Lodges, dates only from the period of the revival of Masonry in 1717. Previous to that period "a sufficient number of brethren," says Preston, (p. 182,) "met together within a certain district with the consent of the sheriff, or other chief magistrate of the place, were empowered to make Masons, and practise the rites of Masonry without a Warrant of Constitution." But in 1717 a regulation was adopted "that the privilege of assembling as Masons, which had been hitherto unlimited, should be vested in certain Lodges or assemblies of Masons convened in certain places; and that every Lodge to be hereafter convened, except the four old Lodges at this time existing, should be legally authorized to act by a Warrant from the Grand Master, for the time being, granted to certain individuals by petition, with the consent and approbation of the Grand Lodge in communication; and that without such Warrant no Lodge should be hereafter deemed regular or constitutional." And consequently, ever since the adoption of that regulation, no Lodge has been regular unless it is working under such an authority. The word Warrant is appropriately used, because in its legal acceptance it means a document giving authority to perform some specified act.

In England, the Warrant of Constitution emanates from the Grand Master; in the United States, from the Grand Lodge. Here the Grand Master grants only a Dispensation to hold a Lodge, which may be revoked or confirmed by the Grand Lodge; in the latter case, the Warrant will then be issued. The Warrant of Constitution is granted to the Master and Wardens, and to their successors in office; it continues in force only during the pleasure of the Grand Lodge, and may, therefore, at any time be revoked, and the Lodge dissolved by a vote of that body, or it may be temporarily arrested or suspended by an edict of the Grand Master. This will, however, never be done, unless the Lodge has violated the ancient landmarks, or failed to pay due respect and obedience to the Grand Lodge or to the Grand Master.

When a Warrant of Constitution is revoked or recalled, the jewels, furniture, and funds of the Lodge revert to the Grand Lodge.

Lastly, as a Lodge holds its communications only under the authority of this Warrant of Constitution, no Lodge can be opened, or proceed to business, unless it be present. If it be mislaid or destroyed, it must be recovered, or another obtained; and until that is done, the communications of the Lodge must be suspended; and if the Warrant of Constitution be taken out of the room during the session of the Lodge, the authority of the Master instantly ceases.

Washing Hands. See Lustration.

Washington, Congress of. A Congress of American Masons was convoked at the city of Washington, in the year 1822, at the call of several Grand Lodges, for the purpose of recommending the establishment of a General Grand Lodge of the United States. The result was an unsuccessful one.

Washington, George. The name of Washington claims a place in Masonic biography, not because of any services he has done to the Institution either as a worker or a writer, but because the fact of his connection with the Craft is a source of pride to every American Mason, at least, who can thus call the "Father of his country" a brother. There is also another reason. While the friends of the Institution have felt that the adhesion to it of a man so eminent for virtue was a proof of its moral and religious character, the opponents of Masonry, being forced to admit the conclusion, have sought to deny the premises, and, even if compelled to admit the fact of Washington's initiation, have persistently asserted that he never took any interest in it, disapproved of its spirit, and at an early period of his life abandoned it. The truth of history requires that these misstatements should be met by a brief recital of his Masonic career.

Washington was initiated, in 1752, in the Lodge at Fredericksburg, Virginia, and the records of that Lodge, still in existence, present the following entries on the subject. The first entry is thus:

"Nov. 4th, 1752. This evening Mr. George Washington was initiated as an Entered Apprentice;" and the receipt of the entrance fee, amounting to £2 3s., is acknowledged.

On the 3d of March in the following year, "Mr. George Washington" is recorded as having been passed a Fellow Craft; and on the 4th of the succeeding August, the record of the transactions of the evening states that "Mr. George Washington," and others whose names are mentioned, have been raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason.

For five years after his initiation, he was engaged in active military service, and it is not likely that during that period his attendance on the communications of the Lodge could have been frequent. Some English writers have asserted that he was made a Mason during the old French War, in a military Lodge attached to the 46th Regiment. The Bible on which he is said to have been obligated is still in existence, although the Lodge was many years ago dissolved, at Halifax, Nova Scotia. The records of the Lodge are or were, not long since, extant, and furnish the evidence that Washington was there, and received some Masonic degree. It is equally clear that he was first initiated in Fredericksburg Lodge, for the record is still in possession of the Lodge.

Three methods have been adopted to reconcile this apparent discrepancy. Bro. Hayden, in his work on Washington and his Masonic Compeers, (p. 81,) suggests that an obligation had been administered to him as a test-oath when visiting the Lodge, or that the Lodge, deeming the authority under which he had been made insufficient, had required him to be healed and reobligated. Neither of these attempts to solve the difficulty appears to have any plausibility.

Bro. C. W. Moore, of Massachusetts, in the Freemasons' Monthly Magazine, (vol. xi., p. 261,) suggests that, as it was then the custom to confer the Mark degree as a side degree in Masters' Lodges, and as it has been proved that Washington was in possession of that degree, he may have received it in Lodge No. 227, attached to the 46th Regiment. This certainly presents a more satisfactory explanation than either of those offered by Bro. Hayden.

The connection of Washington with the British military Lodge will serve as some confirmation of the tradition that he was attentive to Masonic duties during the five years from 1753 to 1758, when he was engaged in military service.

There is ample evidence that during the Revolutionary War, while he was Commander-in-Chief of the American armies, he was a frequent attendant on the meetings of military Lodges. A few years ago, Captain Hugh Maloy, a revolutionary veteran, then residing in Ohio, declared that on one of these occasions he was initiated in Washington's marqu e, the chief himself presiding at the ceremony. Bro. Scott, a Past Grand Master of Virginia, asserted that Washington was in frequent attendance on the communications of the brethren. The proposition made to elect him a Grand Master of the United States, as will be hereafter seen, affords a strong presumption that his name as a Mason had become familiar to the Craft.

In 1777, the Convention of Virginia Lodges recommended Washington as the most proper person to be elected Grand Master of the Independent Grand Lodge of that commonwealth. Dove has given in his Text-Book the complete records of the Convention; and there is therefore no doubt that the nomination was made. It was, however, declined by Washington.

Soon after the beginning of the Revolution, a disposition was manifested among American Masons to dis sever their connection, as subordinates, with the Masonic authorities of the mother country, and in several of the newly-erected States the Provincial Grand Lodges assumed an independent character. The idea of a Grand Master of the whole of the United States had also become popular. On February 7, 1780, a convention of delegates from the military Lodges in the army was holden at Morristown, in New Jersey, when an address to the Grand Masters in the various States was adopted, recommending the establishment of "one Grand Lodge in America," and the election of a Grand Master. This address was sent to the Grand Lodges of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia; and although the name of Washington is not mentioned in it, those Grand Lodges were notified that he was the first choice of the brethren who had framed it.

While these proceedings were in progress, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania had taken action on the same subject. On January 13, 1780, it had held a session, and it was unanimously declared that it was for the benefit of Masonry that "a Grand Master of Masons throughout the United States" should be nominated; whereupon, with equal unanimity, Gen. Washington was elected to the office. It was then ordered that the minutes of the election be transmitted to the different Grand Lodges in the United States, and their concurrence therein be requested. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, doubting the expediency of electing a General Grand Master, declined to come to any determination on the question, and so the subject was dropped.

This will correct the error into which many foreign Grand Lodges and Masonic writers have fallen, of supposing that Washington was ever a Grand Master of the United States. The error was strengthened by a medal contained in Merzdorf's Medals of the Fraternity of Freemasons, which the editor states was struck by the Lodges of Pennsylvania. This statement is, however, liable to great doubt. The date of the medal is 1797. On the obverse is a likeness of Washington, with the device, "Washington, President, 1797." On the reverse is a tracing-board and the device, "Amor, Honor, et Justitia. G. W., G. G. M." French and German Masonic historians have been deceived by this medal, and refer to it as their authority for asserting that Washington was a Grand Master. Lenning and Thory, for instance, place the date of his election to that office in the year in which the medal was struck. More recent European writers, however, directed by the researches of the American authorities, have discovered and corrected the mistake.

We next hear of Washington's official connection in the year 1788. Lodge No. 39, at Alexandria, which had hitherto been working under the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, in 1788 transferred its allegiance to Virginia. On May 29 in that year the Lodge adopted the following resolution:

"The Lodge proceeded to the appointment of Master and Deputy Master to be recommended to the Grand Lodge of Virginia, when George Washington, Esq., was unanimously chosen Master; Robert McCrea, Deputy Master; Wm. Hunter, Jr., Senior Warden; John Allison, Junior Warden."

It was also ordered that a committee should wait on Gen. Washington, "and inquire of him whether it will be agreeable to him to be named in the Charter." What was the result of that interview, we do not positively know. But it is to be presumed that the reply of Washington was a favorable one, for the application for the Charter contained his name, which would hardly have been inserted, if it had been repugnant to his wishes. And the Charter or Warrant under which the Lodge is still working is granted to Washington as Master. The appointing clause is in the following words:

"Know ye that we, Edmund Randolph, Esquire, Governor of the Commonwealth aforesaid, and Grand Master of the Most Ancient and Honorable Society of Freemasons within the same, by and with the consent of the Grand Lodge of Virginia, do hereby constitute and appoint our illustrious and well-beloved Brother, George Washington, Esquire, late General and Commander-in-Chief of the forces of the United States of America, and our worthy Brethren Robert McCrea, William Hunter, Jr., and John Allison, Esqs., together with all such other brethren as may be admitted to associate with them, to be a 'first, true, and regular Lodge of Freemasons, by the name, title, and designation of the Alexandria Lodge, No. 22.'" In 1805, the Lodge, which is still in existence, was permitted by the Grand Lodge to change its name to that of "Washington Alexandria," in honor of its first Master.

The evidence, then, is clear that Washington was the Master of a Lodge. Whether he ever assumed the duties of the office, and, if he assumed, how he discharged them, we know only from the testimony of Timothy Bigelow, who, in a Eulogy delivered before the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, two months after Washington's death, and eleven after his appointment as Master, made the following statement:

"The information received from our brethren who had the happiness to be members of the Lodge over which he presided for many years, and of which he died the Master, furnishes abundant proof of his persevering zeal for the prosperity of the Institution. Constant and punctual in his attendance, scrupulous in his observance of the regulations of the Lodge, and solicitous, at all times, to communicate light and instruction, he discharged the duties of the Chair with uncommon dignity and intelligence in all the mysteries of our art."

There is also a very strong presumption that Washington accepted and discharged the duties of the Chair to the satisfaction of the Lodge. At the first election held after the Charter had been issued, he was elected, or we should rather say re-elected, Master. The record of the Lodge, under the date of December 20, 1788, is as follows:

"His Excellency, General Washington, unanimously elected Master; Robert McCrea, Senior Warden; Wm. Hunter, Jr., Junior Warden; Wm. Hodgson, Treasurer; Joseph Greenway, Secretary; Dr. Frederick Spanbergen, Senior Deacon; George Richards, Junior Deacon." The subordinate officers had undergone a change: McCrea, who had been named in the petition as Deputy Master, an officer not recognized in this country was made Senior Warden; Wm. Hunter, who had been nominated as Senior Warden, was made Junior Warden; and the original Junior Warden, John Allison, was dropped. But there was no change in the office of Master. Washington was again elected. The Lodge would scarcely have been so persistent without his consent; and if his consent was given, we know, from his character, that he would seek to discharge the duties of the office to his best abilities. This circumstance gives, if it be needed, strong confirmation to the statement of Bigelow.

But incidents like these are not all that are left to us to exhibit the attachment of Washington to Masonry. On repeated occasions he has announced, in his letters and addresses to various Masonic bodies, his profound esteem for the character, and his just appreciation of the principles, of that Institution into which, at so early an age, he had been admitted. And during his long and laborious life, no opportunity was presented of which he did not avail himself to evince his esteem for the Institution.

Thus, in the year 1797, in reply to an affectionate address from the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, he says: "My attachment to the Society of which we are members will dispose me always to contribute my best endeavors to promote the honor and prosperity of the Craft."

Five years before this letter was written, he had, in a communication to the same body, expressed his opinion of the Masonic institution as one whose liberal principles are founded on the immutable laws of "truth and justice," and whose "grand object is to promote the happiness of the human race."

In answer to an address from the Grand Lodge of South Carolina in 1791, he says: "I recognize with pleasure my relation to the brethren of your Society," and "I shall be happy, on every occasion, to evince my regard for the Fraternity." And in the same letter he takes occasion to allude to the Masonic institution as "an association whose principles lead to purity of morals, and are beneficial of action."

In writing to the officers and members of St. David's Lodge at Newport, (R. I.,) in the same year, he uses this language: "Being persuaded that a just application of the principles on which the Masonic fraternity is founded must be promotive of private virtue and public prosperity, I shall always be happy to advance the interests of the Society, and to be considered by them as a deserving brother."

And lastly, for I will not further extend these citations, in a letter addressed in November, 1798, only thirteen months before his death, to the Grand Lodge of Maryland, he has made this explicit declaration of his opinion of the Institution:

"So far as I am acquainted with the doctrines and principles of Freemasonry, I conceive them to be founded in benevolence, and to be exercised only for the good of mankind. I cannot, therefore, upon this ground, withdraw my approbation from it."

So much has been said upon the Masonic career and opinions of Washington because American Masons love to dwell on the fact that the distinguished patriot, whose memory is so revered that his unostentatious grave on the banks of the Potomac has become the Mecca of America, was not only a brother of the Craft, but was ever ready to express his good opinion of the Society. They feel that under the panoply of his great name they may defy the malignant charges of their adversaries. They know that no better reply can be given to such charges than to say, in the language of Clinton, "Washington would not have encouraged an Institution hostile to morality, religion, good order, and the public welfare."

Washington Territory. Freemasonry in an organized form was introduced into Washington Territory by the Grand Lodge of Oregon, which established four Lodges there previous to the year 1858. These Lodges were Olympia, No. 5; Steilacoom, No. 8; Grand Mound, No. 21, and Washington, No. 22. On December 6-9, 1858, delegates from these four Lodges met in convention at the city of Olympia, and organized the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of the Territory of Washington. T. F. McElroy was elected Grand Master, and T. M. Reed, Grand Secretary.

The high degrees of the American Rite have not yet been established in Washington Territory; but in 1872 the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite was introduced by Bro. Edwin A. Sherman, the agent of the Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction, and several bodies of that Rite were organized.

Watchwords. Used in the thirty-second degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite because that degree has a military form, but not found in other degrees of Masonry.

Water-fall. Used in the Fellow Craft's degree as a symbol of plenty, for which the word water-ford is sometimes improperly substituted. See Shibboleth.

Wayfaring Man. A word used in the legend of the third degree to denote the person met near the port of Joppa by certain persons sent out on a search by King Solomon. The part of the legend which introduces the wayfaring man, and his interview with the Fellow Crafts, was probably introduced into the American system by Webb, or found by him in the older rituals practised in this country. It is not in the old English rituals of the last century, nor is the circumstance detailed in the present English lecture. A wayfaring man is defined by Phillips as "one accustomed to travel on the road." The expression is becoming obsolete in ordinary language, but it is preserved in Scripture—"he saw a wayfaring man in the street of the city," (Judges xix. 17,)—and in Masonry, both of which still retain many words long since disused elsewhere.

Weary Sojourners. Spoken of in the American legend of the Royal Arch as three of the captives who had been restored to liberty by Cyrus, and, after sojourning or remaining longer in Babylon than the main body of their brethren, had at length repaired to Jerusalem to assist in rebuilding the Temple.

It was while the workmen were engaged in making the necessary excavations for laying the foundation, and while numbers continued to arrive at Jerusalem from Babylon, that these three worn and weary sojourners, after plodding on foot over the rough and devious roads between the two cities, offered themselves to the Grand Council as willing participants in the labor of erection. Who these sojourners were, we have no historical means of discovering; but there is a Masonic tradition (entitled, perhaps, to but little weight) that they were Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, three holy men, who are better known to general readers by their Chaldaic names of Shadrach, Meshech, and Abed-nego, as having been miraculously preserved from the fiery furnace of Nebuchadnezzar.

Their services were accepted, and from their diligent labors resulted that important discovery, the perpetuation and preservation of which constitutes the great end and design of the Royal Arch degree.

Such is the legend of the American Royal Arch. It has no known foundation in history, and is therefore altogether mythical. But it presents, as a myth, the symbolic idea of arduous and unflinching search after truth, and the final reward that such devotion receives.

Webb-Preston Work. The title given by Dr. Robert Morris to a system of lectures which he proposed to introduce, in 1859, into the Lodges of the United States, and in which he was partly successful. He gave this name to his system because his theory was that the lectures of Thomas Smith Webb and those of Preston were identical. But this theory is untenable, for it has long since been shown that the lectures of Webb were an abridgement, and a very material modification of those of Preston. In 1863, and for a few years afterwards, the question of the introduction of the "Webb-Preston work" was a subject of warm, and sometimes of intemperate, discussion in several of the western jurisdictions. It has now, however, at least as a subject of controversy, ceased to attract the attention of the Craft. One favorable result was, however, produced by these discussions, and that is, that they led to a more careful investigation and a better understanding of the nature and history of the rituals which have, during the present century, been practised in this country. The bitterness of feeling has passed away, but the knowledge that it elicited remains.

Webb, Thomas Smith. No name in Masonry is more familiar to the American Mason than that of Webb, who was really the inventor and founder of the system of work which, under the appropriate name of the American Rite (although often improperly called the York Rite), is universally practised in the United States. The most exhaustive biography of him that has been written is that of Bro. Cornelius Moore, in his Leaflets of Masonic Biography, and from that, with a few additions from other sources, the present sketch is derived.

Thomas Smith Webb, the son of parents who a few years previous to his birth had emigrated from England and settled in Boston, Massachusetts, was born in that city, October 13, 1771. He was educated in one of the public schools, where he acquired such knowledge as was at that time imparted in them, and became proficient in the French and Latin languages.

He selected as a profession either that of a printer or a bookbinder; his biographer is uncertain which, but inclines to think that it was the former. After completing his apprenticeship he removed to Keene, in New Hampshire, where he worked at his trade, and about the year 1792 (for the precise date is unknown) was initiated in Freemasonry in Rising Sun Lodge in that town.

While residing at Keene he married Miss Martha Hopkins, and shortly afterwards removed to Albany, New York, where he opened a book-store. When and where he received the high degrees has not been stated, but we find him, while living at Albany, engaged in the establishment of a Chapter and an Encampment.

It was at this early period of his life that Webb appears to have commenced his labors as a Masonic teacher, an office which he continued to fill with great influence until the close of his life. In 1797 he published at Albany the first edition of his Freemasons' Monitor; or, Illustrations of Masonry. It purports to be "by a Royal Arch Mason, K. T., K. M., etc." He did not claim the authorship until the subsequent edition; but his name and that of his partner, Spencer, appear in the imprint as publishers. He acknowledges in the preface his indebtedness to Preston for the observations on the first three degrees. But he states that he has differently arranged Preston's distributions of the sections, because they were "not agreeable to the mode of working in America." This proves that the Prestonian system was not then followed in the United States, and ought to be a sufficient answer to those who at a later period attempted to claim an identity between the lectures of Preston and Webb.

About the year 1801 he removed to Providence, Rhode Island, where he engaged in the manufacture of wall-paper on a rather extensive scale. By this time his reputation as a Masonic teacher had been well established, for a committee was appointed by St John's Lodge of Providence to wait upon and inform him that this Lodge (for his great exertions in the cause of Masonry) wish him to become a member of the same." He accepted the invitation, and passing through the various gradations of office was elected, in 1813, Grand Master of the Masons of Rhode Island.

But it is necessary now to recur to preceding events. In 1797, on October 24, a convention of committees from several Chapters in the Northern States was held in Boston for the purpose of deliberating on the propriety and expediency of establishing a Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons for the Northern States. Of this convention Webb was chosen as the chairman. Previously to this time the Royal Arch degrees had been conferred in Masters' Lodges and under a Lodge Warrant. It is undoubtedly to the influence of Webb that we are to attribute the disseverance of the degree from that jurisdiction and the establishment of independent Chapters. It was one of the first steps that he took in the organization of the American Rite. The circular addressed by the convention to the Chapters of the country was most probably from the pen of Webb.

The Grand Chapter having been organized in January, 1798, Webb was elected Grand Scribe, and re-elected in 1799, at which time the body assumed the title of the General Grand Chapter. In 1806 he was promoted to the office of General Grand King, and in 1816 to that of Deputy General Grand High Priest, which he held until his death.

During all this time, Webb, although actively engaged in the labors of Masonic instruction, continued his interest in the manufacture of wall paper, and in 1817 removed his machinery to the West, Moore thinks, with the intention of making his residence there.

In 1816 he visited the Western States, and remained there two years, during which time he appears to have been actively engaged in the organization of Chapters, Grand Chapters and Encampments. It was during this visit that he established the Grand Chapters of Ohio and Kentucky, by virtue of his powers as a General Grand Officer.

In August, 1818, he left Ohio and returned to Boston. In the spring of 1819, he again began a visit to the West, but he reached no farther than Cleveland, Ohio, where he died very suddenly, it is supposed in a fit of apoplexy, on July 6, 1819, and was buried the next day with Masonic honors. The body was subsequently disinterred and conveyed to Providence, where, on the 8th of November, it was reinterred by the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island.

Webb's influence over the Masons of the United States, as the founder of a Rite, was altogether personal. In Masonic literature he has made no mark, for his labors as an author are confined to a single work, his Monitor, and this is little more than a syllabus of his lectures. Although, if we may judge by the introductory remarks to the various sections of the degrees, and especially to the second one of the third degree, Webb was but little acquainted with the true philosophical symbolism of Freemasonry, such as it was taught by Hutchinson in England and by his contemporaries in this country, Harris and Town, he was what Carson properly calls him, "the ablest Masonic ritualist of his day—the very prince of Masonic workmen," and this was the instrument with which he worked for the extension of the new Rite which he established. The American Rite would have been more perfect as a system had its founder entertained profounder views of the philosophy and symbolism of Masonry as a science; but as it is, with imperfections which time, it is hoped, will remove, and deficiencies which future researches of the Masonic scholar will supply, it still must ever be a monument of the ritualistic skill, the devotion, and the persevering labor of Thomas Smith Webb.

The few odes and anthems composed by Webb for his rituals possess a high degree of poetic merit, and evince the possession of much genius in their author.

Wedekind, Georg Christian Gottlieb, Baron von. A German physician and Professor of Medicine at Metz, and a medical writer of reputation. He was born at Göttingen, January 8, 1761. As a Mason, he was distinguished as a member of the Eclectic Union, and labored effectually for the restoration of good feeling between it and the Directorial Lodge at Frankfort. His Masonic works, which are numerous, consist principally of addresses, controversial pamphlets, and contributions to the Altenburg Journal of Freemasonry. He died in 1831.

Weeping Virgin. The weeping virgin with dishevelled hair, in the monument of the third degree, used in the American Rite, is interpreted as a symbol of grief for the unfinished state of the Temple. Jeremy Cross, who is said to have fabricated the monumental symbol, was not, we are satisfied, acquainted with hermetic science. Yet a woman thus portrayed, standing near a tomb, was a very appropriate symbol for the third degree, whose dogma is the resurrection. In hermetic science, according to Nicolas Flammel, (Hieroglyphica, cap.

xxxii.) a woman having her hair dishevelled and standing near a tomb is a symbol of the soul.

Weishaupt, Adam. He is celebrated in the history of Masonry as the founder of the Order of Illuminati of Bavaria, among whom he adopted the characteristic or Order name of Spartacus. He was born February 6, 1748, at Ingoldstadt, and was educated by the Jesuits, towards whom, however, he afterwards exhibited the bitterest enmity, and was equally hated by them in return. In 1772 he became extraordinary professor of law, and in 1775 professor of natural and canon law, at the University of Ingoldstadt. As the professorship of canon law had been hitherto held only by an ecclesiastic, his appointment gave great offence to the clergy. Weishaupt, whose views were cosmopolitan, and who knew and condemned the bigotry and superstitions of the priests, established an opposing party in the University, consisting principally of young men whose confidence and friendship he had gained. They assembled in a private apartment, and there he discussed with them philosophical subjects, and sought to imbue them with a liberal spirit. This was the beginning of the Order of the Illuminati, or the Enlightened—a name which he bestowed upon his disciples as a token of their advance in intelligence and moral progress.

At first, it was totally unconnected with Masonry, of which Order Weishaupt was not at that time a member. It was not until 1777 that he was initiated in the Lodge Theodore of Good Counsel, at Munich. Thenceforward Weishaupt sought to incorporate his system into that of Masonry, so that the latter might become subservient to his views, and with the assistance of the Baron Knigge, who brought his active energies and genius to the aid of the cause, he succeeded in completing his system of Illuminism. But the clergy, and especially the Jesuits, who, although their Order had been abolished by the government, still secretly possessed great power, redoubled their efforts to destroy their opponent, and they at length succeeded. In 1784, all secret associations were prohibited by a royal decree, and in the following year Weishaupt was deprived of his professorship and banished from the country. He repaired to Gotha, where he was kindly received by Duke Ernest, who made him a counsellor and gave him a pension. There he remained until he died in 1811.

During his residence at Gotha he wrote and published many works, some on philosophical subjects and several in explanation and defence of Illuminism. Among the latter were A Picture of the Illuminati, 1786; A complete History of the Persecutions of the Illuminati in Bavaria, 1786. Of this work only one volume was published; the second, though promised, never appeared. An Apology for the Illuminati, 1786; An Improved System of the Illuminati, 1787, and many others.

No man has ever been more abused and villified than Weishaupt by the adversaries of Freemasonry. In such partisan writers as Barruel and Robison we might expect to find libels against a Masonic reformer. But it is passing strange that Dr. Oliver should have permitted such a passage as the following to sully his pages. (Landmarks, ii. 26.)

"Weishaupt was a shameless libertine, who compassed the death of his sister-in-law to conceal his vices from the world and, as he termed it, to preserve his honor."

To charges like these, founded only in the bitterness of his persecutors, Weishaupt has made the following reply:

"The tenor of my life has been the opposite of everything that is vile; and no man can lay any such thing to my charge."

Indeed, his long continuance in an important religious professorship at Ingoldstadt, the warm affections of his pupils, and the patronage and protection, during the closing years of his life, of the virtuous and amiable Duke of Gotha, would seem to give some assurance that Weishaupt could not have been the monster that he has been painted by his adversaries.

Illuminism, it is true, had its abundant errors, and no one will regret its dissolution. But its founder had hoped by it to effect much good: that it was diverted from its original aim was the fault, not of him, but of some of his disciples; and their faults he was not reluctant to condemn in his writings.

His ambition was, I think, a virtuous one; that it failed was his, and perhaps the world's, misfortune. "My general plan," he says, "is good, though in the detail there may be faults. I had myself to create. In another situation, and in an active station in life, I should have been keenly occupied, and the founding of an Order would never have come into my head. But I would have executed much better things, if the government had not always opposed my exertions, and placed others in situations which suited my talents. It was the full conviction of this, and of what could be done, if every man were placed in the office for which he was fitted by nature, and a proper education, which first suggested to me the plan of Illuminism."

What he really wished Illuminism to be, we may judge from the instructions he gave as to the necessary qualifications of a candidate for initiation. They are as follows:

"Whoever does not close his ear to the lamentations of the miserable, nor his heart to gentle pity; whoever is the friend and brother of the unfortunate; whoever has a heart capable of love and friendship; whoever is steadfast in adversity, unwearied in the carrying out of whatever has been once engaged in, undaunted in the overcoming of difficulties; whoever does not mock and despise the weak; whose soul is susceptible of conceiving great designs, desirous of rising superior to all base motives, and of distinguishing itself by deeds of benevolence; whoever shuns idleness; whoever considers no knowledge as unessential which he may have the opportunity of acquiring, regarding the knowledge of mankind as his chief study; whoever, when truth and virtue are in question, despising the approbation of the multitude, is sufficiently courageous to follow the dictates of his own heart,—such a one is a proper candidate."

The Baron von Knigge, who, perhaps, of all men, best knew him, said of him that he was undeniably a man of genius, and a profound thinker; and that he was all the more worthy of admiration because, while subjected to the influences of a bigoted Catholic education, he had formed his mind by his own meditations, and the reading of good books. His heart, adds this companion of his labors and sharer of his secret thoughts, was excited by the most unselfish desire to do something great, and that would be worthy of mankind, and in the accomplishment of this he was deterred by no opposition and discouraged by no embarrassments.

The truth is, I think, that Weishaupt has been misunderstood by Masonic and slandered by un-Masonic writers. His success in the beginning as a reformer was due to his own honest desire to do good. His failure in the end was attributable to ecclesiastical persecution, and to the faults and follies of his disciples. The master works to elevate human nature; the scholars, to degrade. Weishaupt's place in history should be among the unsuccessful reformers, and not among the profligate adventurers.

Welcome. In the ritual, it is said to be the duty of the Senior Deacon "to welcome and clothe all visiting brethren." That is to say, he is to receive them at the door with all courtesy and kindness, and to furnish them, or see that they are furnished, with the necessary apron and gloves, and, if they are Past Masters, with the appropriate collar and jewel of that office, with an extra supply of which all Lodges were in the olden time supplied. He is to conduct the visitor to a seat, and thus carry out the spirit of the old Charges, which especially inculcate hospitality to strange brethren.

Well Formed, True, and Trusty. A formula used by the Grand Master at the laying of a corner-stone. Having applied the square, level, and plumb to its different surfaces and angles, he declares it to be "well formed, true, and trusty." Borrowed from the technical language of Operative Masonry, it is symbolically applied in reference to the character which the Entered Apprentice should sustain when, in the course of his initiation, he assumes the place of a typical corner-stone in the Lodge.

Wesley, Samuel. At one time the most distinguished organist of England, and called by Mendelssohn "the father of English organ-playing." He was initiated as a Mason December 17, 1788, and in 1812, the office of Grand Organist of the Grand Lodge of England being in that year first instituted, he received the appointment from the Grand Master, the Duke of Sussex, and held it until 1818. He composed the anthem performed at the union of the two Grand Lodges in 1813, and was the composer of many songs, glees, etc., for the use of the Craft. He was the son of the Rev. Charles Wesley, and nephew of the celebrated John Wesley, the founder of Methodism. Born February 24, 1766, at Bristol, England, and died October 11, 1837. He was well entitled to the epithet of the "Great Musician of Masonry."

West. Although the west, as one of the four cardinal points, holds an honorable position as the station of the Senior Warden, and of the pillar of Strength that supports the Lodge, yet, being the place of the sun's setting and opposed to the east, the recognized place of light, it, in Masonic symbolism, represents the place of darkness and ignorance. The old tradition, that in primeval times all human wisdom was confined to the eastern part of the world, and that those who had wandered towards the west were obliged to return to the east in search of the knowledge of their ancestors, is not confined to Masonry. Creuzer (Symbolik) speaks of an ancient and highly-instructed body of priests in the East, from whom all knowledge, under the veil of symbols, was communicated to the Greeks and other unenlightened nations of the West. And in the "Legend of the Craft," contained in the old Masonic Constitutions, there is always a reference to the emigration of the Masons from Egypt eastward to the "land of behest," or Jerusalem. Hence, in the modern symbolism of Speculative Masonry, it is said that the Mason during his advancement is travelling from the West to the East in search of light.

Westphalia, Secret Tribunals of. The Vehmgerichte, or Fehmgerichte, were secret criminal courts of Westphalia in the Middle Ages. The origin of this institution, like that of Masonry, has been involved in uncertainty. The true meaning of the name even is doubtful. Vaem is said by Dreyer to signify holy in the old Northern languages; and, if this be true, a Fehmgericht would mean a holy court. But it has also been suggested that the word comes from the Latin fama, or rumor, and that a Fehmgericht was so called because it proceeded to the trial of persons whose only accuser was common rumor, the maxim of the German law, "no accuser, no judge," being in such a case departed from. They were also called Tribunals of Westphalia, because their jurisdiction and existence were confined to that country.

The Mediæval Westphalia was situated within the limits of the country bounded on the west by the Rhine, on the east by the Weser, on the north by Friesland, and on the south by Westerwald. Rander (Tour through Germany, p. 186,) says that the tribunals were only to be found in the duchies of Gueldres, Cleves, and Westphalia, in the principal cities of Corvey and Minden, in the landgraviate of Hesse, in the counties of Bentheim, Limburg, Lippe, Mark, Ravensberg, Reclinghausen, Rietzberg, Sayn, Waldeck, and Steinfurt, in some baronies, as Gehmen, Neustadt, and Rheda, and in the free imperial city of Dortmund; but these were all included within the limits of Mediæval Westphalia.

It has been supposed that the first secret tribunals were established by the Emperor Charlemagne on the conquest of Saxony. In 803 the Saxons obtained among other privileges that of retaining their national laws, and administering them under imperial judges who had been created Counts of the Empire. Their courts, it is said, were held three times a year in an open field, and their sessions were held in public on ordinary occasions; but in all cases of religious offence, such as apostasy, heresy, or sacrilege, although the trial began in a public session, it always ended in a secret tribunal.

It has been supposed by some writers that these courts of the Counts of the Empire instituted by Charlemagne gave origin to the secret tribunals of Westphalia, which were held in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. There is no external evidence of the truth of this hypothesis. It was, however, the current opinion of the time, and all the earlier traditions and documents of the courts themselves trace their origin to Charlemagne. Paul Wigand, the German jurist and historian, who wrote a history of their tribunals, (Fehmgericht Westfälens, Hamburg, 1826,) contends for the truth of these traditions; and Sir Francis Palgrave, in his Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth, says, unhesitatingly, that "the Vehmick tribunals can only be considered as the original jurisdictions of the old Saxons which survived the subjugation of their country." The silence on this subject in the laws and capitularies of Charlemagne has been explained on the ground that these tribunals were not established authoritatively by that monarch, but only permitted by a tacit sanction to exist.

The author of the article on the Secret Societies of the Middle Ages, published in the Library of Entertaining Knowledge, who has written somewhat exhaustively on this subject, says that the first writers who have mentioned these tribunals are Henry of Hervorden in the fourteenth, and Æneas Sylvius in the fifteenth century; both of whom, however, trace them to the time of Charlemagne; but Jacob (Recherches Historiques sur les Croisades et les Templiers, p. 132,) cites a diploma of Count Engelbert de la Mark, of the date of 1267, in which there is an evident allusion to some of their usages. Rander says that they are first generally known in the year 1220. But their absolute historical existence is confined to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The secret Westphalian tribunals were apparently created for the purpose of preserving public morals, of punishing crime, and of protecting the poor and weak from the oppressions of the rich and powerful. They were outside of the regular courts of the country, and in this respect may be compared to the modern "vigilance committees" sometimes instituted in this country for the protection of the well-disposed citizens in newly-settled territories from the annoyance of lawless men. But the German tribunals differed from the American committees in this, that they were recognized by the emperors, and that their decisions and executions partook of a judicial character.

The Vehmick tribunals, as they are also called, were governed by a minute system of regulations, the strict observance of which preserved their power and influence for at least two centuries.

At the head of the institution was the Emperor, for in Germany he was recognized as the source of law. His connection with the association was either direct or indirect. If he had been initiated into it, as was usually the case, then his connection was direct and immediate. If, however, he was not an initiate, then his powers were delegated to a lieutenant, who was a member of the tribunal.

Next to the Emperor came the free counts. Free counties were certain districts comprehending several parishes, where the judges and counsellors of the secret ban exercised jurisdiction in conformity with the statutes. The free count, who was called Stuhlherr, or tribunal lord, presided over this free county and the tribunal held within it. He had also the prerogative of erecting other tribunals within his territorial limits, and if he did not preside in person, he appointed a Freigraf, or free judge, to supply his place. No one could be invested with the dignity of a free judge unless he were a Westphalian by birth, born in lawful wedlock of honest parents; of good repute, charged with no crime, and well qualified to preside over the county. They derived their name of free judges from the fact that the tribunals exercised their jurisdiction over only free men, serfs being left to the control of their own lords.

Next in rank to the free judges were the Schöppen, as assessors or counsellors. They formed the main body of the association, and were nominated by the free judge, with the consent of the stuhlherr, and vouched for by two members of the tribunal. A schöppe was required to be a Christian, a Westphalian of honest birth, neither excommunicated nor outlawed, nor involved in any suit before the Fehmgericht, and not a member of any monastic or ecclesiastical order. There were two classes of these assessors or schöppen: a lower class or grade called the Ignorant, who had not been initiated, and were consequently not permitted to be present at the secret session; and a higher grade, called the Knowing, who were subjected to a form of initiation.

The ceremonies of initiation of a free judge were very solemn and symbolic. The candidate appeared bareheaded before the tribunal, and answered certain questions respecting his qualifications. Then, kneeling, with the thumb and forefinger of the right hand on a naked sword and halber, he pronounced the following oath: "I swear by the Holy Trinity that I will, from henceforth, aid, keep, and conceal the holy Fehms from wife and child, from father and mother, from sister and brother, from fire and wind, from all that the sun shines on and the rain covers, from all that is between sky and earth, especially from the man who knows the law; and will bring before this free tribunal, under which I am sitting, all that belongs to the secret jurisdiction of the Emperor, whether I know it to be true myself or have heard it from trustworthy men, whatever requires correction or punishment, whatever is committed within the jurisdiction of the Fehm, that it may be judged, or, with the consent of the accuser, be put off in grace; and will not cease so to do for love or for fear, for gold or for silver, or for precious stones; and will strengthen this tribunal and jurisdiction with all my five senses and power; and that I do not take on me this office for any other cause than for the sake of right and justice. Moreover, that I will ever advance and honor this free tribunal more than any other free tribunals; and what I thus promise will I steadfastly and firmly keep; so help me God and his Holy Gospel."

He further swore in an additional oath that he would, to the best of his ability, enlarge the holy empire, and would undertake nothing with unrighteous hand against the land and people of the Stuhlherr, or Lord of the Tribunal. His name was then inserted in the Book of Gold.

The secrets of the tribunal were then communicated to the candidate, and with them the modes of recognition by which he could be enabled to discover his fellow-members. The sign is described to have been made by placing, when at table, the point of their knife pointing to themselves, and the haft away from them. This was also accompanied by the words Stock Stein, Gras Grein, the meaning of which phrase is unknown.

The duties of the initiated were to act as assessors or judges at the meetings of the courts, to constitute which at least seven were required to be present; and also to go through the country, serve citations upon the accused, and to execute the sentences of the tribunals upon criminals, as well as to trace out and denounce all evil-doers. The punishment of an initiate who had betrayed any of the secrets of the society was severe. His tongue was torn out by the roots; and he was then hung on a tree seven feet higher than any other felon.

The ceremonies practised when a Fehm court was held were very symbolic in their character. Before the free count stood a table, on which were placed a naked sword and a cord of withe. The sword, which was cross-handled, is explained in their ritual as signifying the cross on which Christ suffered for our sins, and the cord the punishment of the wicked. All had their heads uncovered, to signify that they would proceed openly and fairly, punish in proportion to guilt, and cover no right with a wrong. Their hands also were uncovered, to show that they would do nothing covertly and underhand; and they wore cloaks, to signify their warm love for justice, for as the cloak covers all the other garments and the body, so should their love cover justice. Lastly, they were to wear neither armor nor weapons, that no one might feel fear, and to indicate that they were under the peace of the empire. They were charged to be cool and sober, lest passion or intoxication should lead them to pass an unjust judgment.

Writers of romance have clothed these tribunals with additional mystery. But the stories that they were held at night, and in subterranean places, have no foundation save in the imagination of those who have invented them. They were held, like other German courts, at break of day and in the open air, generally beneath a tree in the forest, or elsewhere. The public tribunals were, of course, open to all. It was the secret ones only that were held in private. But the time and place were made known to the accused in the notification left at his residence, or, if that were unknown, as in the case of a vagabond, at a place where four roads met, being affixed to the ground or to a tree, and the knowledge might be easily communicated by him to his friends.

The Chapter-General met once a year, generally at Dortmund or Arensburg, but always at some place in Westphalia. It consisted of the tribunal lords and free counts, who were convoked by the Emperor or his lieutenant. If the Emperor was an initiate, he might preside in person; if he was not, he was represented by his lieutenant. At these Chapters the proceedings of the various Fehm courts were reviewed, and hence these latter made a return of the names of the persons initiated, the suits they had commenced, the sentences they had passed, and the punishments they had inflicted. The Chapter-General acted also as a court of appeals. In fact, the relation of a Chapter-General to the Fehm courts was precisely the same as that of a Grand Lodge of Masons to its subordinates. The resemblance, too, in the symbolic character of the two institutions was striking. But here the resemblance ended, for it has never been contended that there was or could be any connection whatever between the two institutions. But the coincidences show that peculiar spirit and love of mystery which prevailed in those times, and the influence of which was felt in Masonry as well as in the Westphalian tribunals, and all the other secret societies of the Middle Ages.

The crimes of which the Fehmgericht claimed a jurisdiction were, according to the statutes passed at Arensburg in 1490, of two kinds: those cognizant by the secret tribunal, and those cognizant by the public tribunal. The crimes cognizant by the secret tribunal were, violations of the secrets of Charlemagne and of the Fehmgericht, heresy, apostasy, perjury, and witchcraft or magic. Those cognizant by the public tribunal were, sacrilege, theft, rape, robbery of women in childbirth, treason, highway robbery, murder or manslaughter, and vagrancy. Sometimes the catalogue of crimes was modified and often enlarged. There was one period when all the crimes mentioned in the decalogue were included; and indeed there was no positive restriction of the jurisdiction of the tribunals, which generally were governed in their proceedings by what they deemed expedient for the public peace and safety.

In the early history of the institution, its trials were conducted with impartiality, and its judgments rendered in accordance with justice, being constantly restrained by mercy, so that they were considered by the populace as being of great advantage in those times of lawlessness. But at length the institution became corrupt, and often aided instead of checking oppression, a change which finally led to its decay.

When any one was accused, he was summoned to appear before the tribunal at a certain specified time and place. If he was an initiate, the summons was repeated three times; but if not, that is, if any other than an inhabitant of Westphalia, the summons was given only once. If he appeared, an opportunity was afforded him of defence. An initiate could purge himself by a simple oath of denial, but any other person was required to adduce sufficient testimony of his innocence. If the accused did not appear, nor render a satisfactory excuse for his absence, the court proceeded to declare him outlawed, and a free judge was delegated to put him to death wherever found.

Where three free judges found any one flagrante delicto, or in the very act of committing a crime, or having just perpetrated it, they were authorized to put him to death without the formality of a trial. But if he succeeded in making his escape before the penalty was inflicted, he could not on a subsequent arrest be put to death. His case must then be brought for trial before a tribunal.

The sentence of the court, if capital, was not announced to the criminal, and he learned it only when, in some secret place, the executioners of the decree of the Fehmgericht met him and placed the halter around his neck and suspended him to a neighboring tree. The punishment of death was always by hanging, and from a tree. The fact that a dead body was thus found in the forest, was an intimation to those who found it that the person had died by the judgment of the secret tribunal.

It is very evident that an institution like this could be justified, or even tolerated, only in a country and at a time when the power and vices of the nobles, and the general disorganization of society, had rendered the law itself powerless; and when in the hands of persons of irreproachable character, the weak could only thus be protected from the oppressions of the strong, the virtuous from the aggression of the vicious. It was in its commencement a safeguard for society; and hence it became so popular that its initiates numbered at one time over one hundred thousand, and men of rank and influence sought with avidity admission into its circle.

In time the institution became demoralized. Purity of character was no longer insisted on as a qualification for admission. Its decrees and judgments were no longer marked with unfaltering justice, and, instead of defending the weak any longer from the oppressor, it often became itself the willing instrument of oppression. Efforts were made from time to time to inaugurate reforms, but the prevailing spirit of the age, now beginning to be greatly improved by the introduction of the Roman law and the spread of the Protestant religion, was opposed to the self-constituted authority of the tribunals. They began to dissolve almost insensibly, and after the close of the sixteenth century we hear no more of them, although there never was any positive decree of dissolution enacted or promulgated by the State. They were destroyed, not by any edict of law, but by the progressive spirit of the people.

West Virginia. Originally, all the Lodges in the western part of Virginia were under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of that State. But the new State of West Virginia having been formed in 1863, nine Lodges sent delegates to a convention held at Fairmount, April 12, 1865, which, after some discussion, adjourned to meet again on May 10th of the same year, when the Grand Lodge of West Virginia was organized, and W. J. Bates elected Grand Master.

The Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of West Virginia was organized, November 16, 1871, by a convention of five Chapters. The Grand Chapter of Virginia, under which these Chapters held their Warrants, had previously given its consent to the organization.

White. White is one of the most ancient as well as most extensively diffused of the symbolic colors. It is to be found in all the ancient mysteries, where it constituted, as it does in Masonry, the investiture of the candidate. It always, however, and everywhere has borne the same significance as the symbol of purity and innocence.

In the religious observances of the Hebrews, white was the color of one of the curtains of the tabernacle, where, according to Josephus, it was a symbol of the element of earth; and it was employed in the construction of the ephod of the high priest, of his girdle, and of the breastplate. The word לָבָן, laban, which in the Hebrew language signifies "to make white," also denotes "to purify;" and there are to be found throughout the Scriptures many allusions to the color as an emblem of purity. "Though thy sins be as scarlet," says Isaiah, "they shall be as white as snow." Jeremiah, describing the once innocent condition of Zion, says, "her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk." "Many," says Daniel, "shall be purified and made white." In Revelation, a white stone was the reward promised by the Spirit to those who overcame; and again, "he that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white garments;" and in another part of the same book the Apostle is instructed to say that fine linen, clean and white, is the righteousness of the saints. The ancient prophets always imagined the Deity clothed in white, because, says Portal, (Des Couleurs Symboliques, p. 35), "white is the color of absolute truth, of Him who is; it alone reflects all the luminous rays; it is the unity whence all the primitive colors emanate." Thus Daniel, in one of his prophetic visions, saw the Ancient of days, "whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool." Here, says Dr. Henry, (Comm. in loco), the whiteness of the garment "noted the splendor and purity of God in all the administrations of his justice."

Among the Gentile nations, the same reverence was paid to this color. The Egyptians decorated the head of their deity, Osiris, with a white tiara. In the school of Pythagoras, the sacred hymns were chanted in white robes. The Druids clothed their initiates who had arrived at the ultimate degree, or that of perfection, in white vestments. In all the mysteries of other nations of antiquity, the same custom was observed. White was, in general, the garment of the Gentile as well as of the Hebrew priests in the performance of their sacred rites. As the divine power was supposed to be represented on earth by the priesthood, in all nations the sovereign pontiff was clad in white. Aaron was directed to enter the sanctuary only in white garments; in Persia, the Magi wore white robes, because, as they said, they alone were pleasing to the Deity; and the white tunic of Ormuzd is still the characteristic garment of the modern Parsees.

White, among the ancients, was consecrated to the dead, because it was the symbol of the regeneration of the soul. On the monuments of Thebes the manes or ghosts are represented as clothed in white; the Egyptians wrapped their dead in white linen; Homer (Iliad xviii. 353,) refers to the same custom when he makes the attendants cover the dead body of Patroclus, phareï leukō, with a white pall; and Pausanias tells us that the Messenians practised the same customs, clothing their dead in white, and placing crowns upon their heads, indicating by this double symbolism the triumph of the soul over the empire of death.

The Hebrews had the same usage. St. Matthew (xxvii. 59,) tells us that Joseph of Arimathea wrapped the dead body of our Lord "in a clean linen cloth." Adopting this as a suggestion, Christian artists have, in their paintings of the Saviour after his resurrection, depicted him in a white robe. And it is with this idea that in the Apocalypse white vestments are said to be the symbols of the regeneration of souls, and the reward of the elect. It is this consecration of white to the dead that caused it to be adopted as the color of mourning among the nations of antiquity. As the victor in the games was clothed in white, so the same color became the symbol of the victory achieved by the departed in the last combat of the soul with death. "The friends of the deceased wore," says Plutarch, "his livery, in commemoration of his triumph." The modern mourning in black is less philosophic and less symbolic than this ancient one in white.

In Speculative Masonry, white is the symbol of purity. This symbolism commences at the earliest point of initiation, when the white apron is presented to the candidate as a symbol of purity of life and rectitude of conduct. Wherever in any of the subsequent initiations this color appears, it is always to be interpreted as symbolizing the same idea. In the thirty-third degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, the Sovereign Inspector is invested with a white scarf as inculcating that virtuous deportment above the tongue of all reproach which should distinguish the possessors of that degree, the highest in the Rite.

This symbolism of purity was most probably derived by the Masons from that of the primitive church, where a white garment was placed on the catechumen who was about to be baptized, as a token that he had put off the lusts of the flesh, and, being cleansed from his former sins, had obliged himself to maintain an unspotted life. The ancient symbolism of regeneration which appertained to the ancient idea of the color white has not been adopted in Masonry; and yet it would be highly appropriate in an Institution one of whose chief dogmas is the resurrection.

White Ball. In Freemasonry, equivalent to a favorable or affirmative vote. The custom of using white and black balls seems to have been derived from the Romans, who in the earlier days of the republic used white and black balls in their judicial trials, which were cast into an urn, the former acquitting and with the latter condemning the accused.

White Cross Knights. A title sometimes applied to the Knights Hospitallers of St. John, from the color of their cross. Porter (Hist. Knts. of Malta, i. 166,) says: "Villiers hastily assembled a troop of White Cross Knights, and, issuing from the city by a side gate, made a circuit so as, if possible, to fall upon the flank of the foe unperceived."

White Mantle, Order of the. The Teutonic Knights were so denominated in allusion to the color of their cloaks, on which they bore a black cross.

White Masonry. (Maçonnerie blanche.) A title given by French writers to Female Masonry, or the Masonry of Adoption, White Stone. A symbol in the Mark degree referring to the passage in the Apocalypse (ii. 17): "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna; and I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it." In this passage it is supposed that the Evangelist alluded to the stones or tesserae which, among the ancients and the early Christians, were used as tokens of alliance and friendship. Hence in the Mark degree, the white stone and the new name inscribed upon it is a symbol of the covenant made between the possessors of the degree, which will in all future time, and under every circumstance of danger or distress, secure the kind and fraternal assistance of all upon whom the same token has been bestowed. In the symbolism of the degree the candidate represents that white stone upon whom the new name as a Mark Master is to be inscribed. See Mark and Tessera Hospitalis.

White, William Henry. Distinguished for his services to the Craft of England, whom he served as Grand Secretary for the long period of forty-seven years. He was the son of William White, who was also Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of England for thirty-two years, the office having thus been held by father and son for seventy-nine years. William Henry White was born in 1778. On April 15, 1799, he was initiated in Emulation Lodge, No. 12, now called the Lodge of Emulation, No. 21, having been nominated by his father. December 15, 1800, he was elected Master of the Lodge, and presided until 1809. In 1805 he was appointed a Grand Steward, and in 1810 Grand Secretary, as the assistant of his father. This office was held by them conjointly for three years. In 1813, at the union of the two Grand Lodges, he was appointed, with Edwards Harper, Joint Grand Secretary of the United Grand Lodge of England, and in 1838 sole Grand Secretary. In 1857, after a service of nearly half a century, he retired from the office, the Grand Lodge unanimously voting him a retiring pension equal in amount to his salary. On that occasion the Earl of Zetland, Grand Master, said: "I know of no one, and I believe there never was any one who has done more, who has rendered more valuable services to Masonry than our worthy Brother White." In view of the great names in Masonic literature and labor which preceded him, the eulogium will be deemed exaggerated; but the devotion of the Grand Secretary to the Order, and his valuable services during his long and active life, cannot be denied. During the latter years of his official term, he was charged with inactivity and neglect of duty, but the fault has been properly attributed to the increasing infirmities of age. A service of plate was presented to him by the Craft, June 20, 1850, as a testimonial of esteem. He died April 5, 1866.

Widow's Son. In Ancient Craft Masonry, the title applied to Hiram, the architect of the Temple, because he is said, in the First Book of Kings, (vii. 14,) to have been "a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali." The Adonhiramite Masons have a tradition which Chapron gives (Necessaire Maçon., p. 101,) in the following words: "The Masons call themselves the widow's sons, because, after the death of our respectable Master, the Masons took care of his mother, whose children they called themselves, because Adonhiram had always considered them as his brethren. But the French Masons subsequently changed the myth and called themselves 'Sons of the Widow,' and for this reason. 'As the wife of Hiram remained a widow after her husband was murdered, the Masons, who regard themselves as the descendants of Hiram, call themselves Sons of the Widow.'" But this myth is a pure invention, and is without the scriptural foundation of the York myth, which makes Hiram himself the widow's son. But in French Masonry the term "Son of the Widow" is synonymous with "Mason."

The adherents of the exiled house of Stuart, when seeking to organize a system of political Masonry by which they hoped to secure the restoration of the family to the throne of England, transferred to

Charles II. the tradition of Hiram Abif betrayed by his followers, and called him "the Widow's Son," because he was the son of Henrietta Maria, the widow of Charles I. For the same reason they subsequently applied the phrase to his brother, James II.

Wife and Daughter, Mason's. See Mason's Wife and Daughter.

Wilhelmsbad, Congress of. At Wilhelmsbad, near the city of Hanau in Hesse-Cassel, was held the most important Masonic Congress of the eighteenth century. It was convoked by Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick, Grand Master of the Order of Strict Observance; and was opened July 16, 1782. Its duration extended to thirty sessions, and in its discussions the most distinguished Masons of Germany were engaged. Neither the Grand Lodge of Germany, nor that of Sweden, was represented; and the Grand Lodge of the Three Globes, at Berlin, sent only a letter; but there were delegates from Upper and Lower Germany, from Holland, Russia, Italy, France, and Austria; and the Order of the Illuminati was represented by the Baron von Knigge. It is not therefore surprising that the most heterogeneous opinions were expressed. Its avowed object was the reform of the Masonic system, and its disentanglement from the confused mass of rites and high degrees with which French and German pretenders or enthusiasts had been for years past overwhelming it. Important topics were proposed, such as the true origin of Speculative Masonry, whether it was merely conventional and the result of modern thought, or whether it was the offspring of a more ancient order, and, if so, what was that order; whether there were any Superiors General then existing, and who these Unknown Superiors were, etc. These and kindred questions were thoroughly discussed, but not defined, and the Congress was eventually closed without coming to any other positive determination than that Freemasonry was not essentially connected with Templarism, and that, contrary to the doctrine of the Rite of Strict Observance, the Freemasons were not the successors of the Knights Templars. The real effect of the Congress of Wilhelmsbad was the abolition of that Rite, which soon after drooped and died.

Will. In some of the continental Rites, and in certain high degrees, it is a custom to require the recipient to make, before his initiation, a will and testament, exhibiting what are his desires as to the distribution of his property at his decease. The object seems to be to add solemnity to the ceremony, and to impress the candidate with the thought of death. But I am inclined to think that it is a custom which would be "more honored in the breach than the observance." It is not practised in the York and American Rites.

Wilson Manuscript. In the marginal notes to the Manifesto of the Lodge of Antiquity, published in 1778, there is reference to an "O. MS. in the hands of Mr. Wilson of Broomhead, near Sheffield, Yorkshire, written in the reign of King Henry VIII." It seems, from the context, to have been cited as authority for the existence of a General Assembly of the Craft at the city of York. But no part of the MS. has ever been printed or transcribed, and it is now apparently lost.

Winding Stairs. In the First Book of Kings (vi. 8) it is said: "The door for the middle chamber was in the right side of the house; and they went up with windings stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third." From this passage the Masons of the last century adopted the symbol of the winding stairs, and introduced it into the Fellow Craft's degree, where it has ever since remained, in the York and American Rites. In one of the high degrees of the Scottish Rite the winding stairs are called cochleus, which is a corruption of cochlis, a spiral staircase. The Hebrew word is lulim, from the obsolete root lul, to roll or wind. The whole story of the winding stairs in the second degree of Masonry is a mere myth, without any other foundation than the slight allusion in the Book of Kings which has been just cited, and it derives its only value from the symbolism taught in its legend. See Middle Chamber and Winding Stairs, Legend of the.

Winding Stairs, Legend of the. I formerly so fully investigated the true meaning of the legend of the winding stairs, as taught in the degree of Fellow Craft, that I can now find nothing to add to what I have already said in my work on The Symbolism of Freemasonry, published in 1869. I might, in writing a new article, change the language, but I could furnish no new idea. I shall not, therefore, hesitate to transfer much of what I have said on this subject in that work to the present article. It is an enlargement and development of the meagre explanations given in the ordinary lecture of Webb.

In an investigation of the symbolism of the winding stairs, we shall be directed to the true explanation by a reference to their origin, their number, the objects which they recall, and their termination, but above all by a consideration of the great design which an ascent upon them was intended to accomplish.

The steps of this winding staircase commenced, we are informed, at the porch of the Temple; that is to say, at its very entrance. But nothing is more undoubted in the science of Masonic symbolism than that the Temple was the representative of the world purified by the Shekinah, or the Divine Presence. The world of the profane is without the Temple; the world of the initiated is within its sacred walls. Hence to enter the Temple, to pass within the porch, to be made a Mason, and to be born into the world of Masonic light, are all synonymous and convertible terms. Here, then, the symbolism of the winding stairs begins.

The Apprentice, having entered within the porch of the temple, has begun his Masonic life. But the first degree in Masonry, like the lesser mysteries of the ancient systems of initiation, is only a preparation and purification for something higher. The Entered Apprentice is the child in Masonry. The lessons which he receives are simply intended to cleanse the heart and prepare the recipient for that mental illumination which is to be given in the succeeding degrees.

As a Fellow Craft, he has advanced another step, and as the degree is emblematic of youth, so it is here that the intellectual education of the candidate begins. And therefore, here, at the very spot which separates the porch from the sanctuary, where childhood ends and manhood begins, he finds stretching out before him a winding stair which invites him, as it were, to ascend, and which, as the symbol of discipline and instruction, teaches him that here must commence his Masonic labor—here he must enter upon those glorious though difficult researches the end of which is to be the possession of divine truth. The winding stairs begin after the candidate has passed within the porch and between the pillars of strength and establishment, as a significant symbol to teach him that as soon as he has passed beyond the years of irrational childhood, and commenced his entrance upon manly life, the laborious task of self-improvement is the first duty that is placed before him. He cannot stand still, if he would be worthy of his vocation; his destiny as an immortal being requires him to ascend, step by step, until he has reached the summit, where the treasures of knowledge await him.

The number of these steps in all the systems has been odd. Vitruvius remarks—that the ancient temples were always ascended by an odd number of steps; and he assigns as the reason, that, commencing with the right foot at the bottom, the worshipper would find the same foot foremost when he entered the temple, which was considered as a fortunate omen. But the fact is, that the symbolism of numbers was borrowed by the Masons from Pythagoras, in whose system of philosophy it plays an important part, and in which odd numbers were considered as more perfect than even ones. Hence, throughout the Masonic system we find a predominance of odd numbers; and while three, five, seven, nine, fifteen, and twenty-seven, are all-important symbols, we seldom find a reference to two, four, six, eight, or ten. The odd number of the stairs was therefore intended to symbolize the idea of perfection, to which it was the object of the aspirant to attain.

As to the particular number of the stairs, this has varied at different periods. Tracing-boards of the last century have been found, in which only five steps are delineated, and others in which they amount to seven. The Prestonian lectures, used in England in the beginning of this century, gave the whole number as thirty-eight, dividing them into series of one, three, five, seven, nine, and eleven. The error of making an even number, which was a violation of the Pythagorean principle of odd numbers as the symbol of perfection, was corrected in the Hemming lectures, adopted at the union of the two Grand Lodges of England, by striking out the eleven, which was also objectionable as receiving a sectarian explanation. In this country the number was still further reduced to fifteen, divided into three series of three, five, and seven. I shall adopt this American division in explaining the symbolism; although, after all, the particular number of the steps, or the peculiar method of their division into series, will not in any way affect the general symbolism of the whole legend.

The candidate, then, in the second degree of Masonry, represents a man starting forth on the journey of life, with the great task before him of self-improvement. For the faithful performance of this task, a reward is promised, which reward consists in the development of all his intellectual faculties, the moral and spiritual elevation of his character, and the acquisition of truth and knowledge. Now, the attainment of this moral and intellectual condition supposes an elevation of character, an ascent from a lower to a higher life, and a passage of toil and difficulty, through rudimentary instruction, to the full fruition of wisdom. This is therefore beautifully symbolized by the winding stairs, at whose foot the aspirant stands ready to climb the toilsome steep, while at its top is placed "that hieroglyphic bright which none but Craftsmen ever saw," as the emblem of divine truth. And hence a distinguished writer has said that "these steps, like all the Masonic sym-bolds, are illustrative of discipline and doctrine, as well as of natural, mathematical, and metaphysical science, and open to us an extensive range of moral and speculative inquiry."

The candidate, incited by the love of virtue and the desire of knowledge, and withal eager for the reward of truth which is set before him, begins at once the toilsome ascent. At each division he pauses to gather instruction from the symbolism which these divisions present to his attention.

At the first pause which he makes he is instructed in the peculiar organization of the order of which he has become a disciple. But the information here given, if taken in its naked, literal sense, is barren, and unworthy of his labor. The rank of the officers who govern, and the names of the degrees which constitute the Institution, can give him no knowledge which he has not before possessed. We must look therefore to the symbolic meaning of these allusions for any value which may be attached to this part of the ceremony.

The reference to the organization of the Masonic institution is intended to remind the aspirant of the union of men in society, and the development of the social state out of the state of nature. He is thus reminded, in the very outset of his journey, of the blessings which arise from civilization, and of the fruits of virtue and knowledge which are derived from that condition. Masonry itself is the result of civilization; while, in grateful return, it has been one of the most important means of extending that condition of mankind.

All the monuments of antiquity that the ravages of time have left, combine to prove that man had no sooner emerged from the savage into the social state, than he commenced the organization of religious mysteries, and the separation, by a sort of divine instinct, of the sacred from the profane. Then came the invention of architecture as a means of providing convenient dwellings and necessary shelter from the inclemencies and vicissitudes of the seasons, with all the mechanical arts connected with it; and lastly, geometry, as a necessary science to enable the cultivators of land to measure and designate the limits of their possessions. All these are claimed as peculiar characteristics of Speculative Masonry, which may be considered as the type of civilization, the former bearing the same relation to the profane world as the latter does to the savage state. Hence we at once see the fitness of the symbolism which commences the aspirant's upward progress in the cultivation of knowledge and the search after truth, by recalling to his mind the condition of civilization and the social union of mankind as necessary preparations for the attainment of these objects. In the allusions to the officers of a Lodge, and the degrees of Masonry as explanatory of the organization of our own society, we clothe in our symbolic language the history of the organization of society.

Advancing in his progress, the candidate is invited to contemplate another series of instructions. The human senses, as the appropriate channels through which we receive all our ideas of perception, and which, therefore, constitute the most important sources of our knowledge, are here referred to as a symbol of intellectual cultivation. Architecture, as the most important of the arts which conduce to the comfort of mankind, is also alluded to here, not simply because it is so closely connected with the operative institution of Masonry, but also as the type of all the other useful arts. In his second pause, in the ascent of the winding stairs, the aspirant is therefore reminded of the necessity of cultivating practical knowledge.

So far, then, the instructions he has received relate to his own condition in society as a member of the great social compact, and to his means of becoming, by a knowledge of the arts of practical life, a necessary and useful member of that society.

But his motto will be, "Excelsior." Still must he go onward and forward. The stair is still before him; its summit is not yet reached, and still further treasures of wisdom are to be sought for, or the reward will not be gained, nor the middle chamber, the abiding-place of truth, be reached.

In his third pause, he therefore arrives at that point in which the whole circle of human science is to be explained. Symbols, we know, are in themselves arbitrary and of conventional signification, and the complete circle of human science might have been as well symbolized by any other sign or series of doctrines as by the seven liberal arts and sciences. But Masonry is an institution of the olden time; and this selection of the liberal arts and sciences as a symbol of the completion of human learning is one of the most pregnant evidences that we have of its antiquity.

In the seventh century, and for a long time afterwards, the circle of instruction to which all the learning of the most eminent schools and most distinguished philosophers was confined, was limited to what were then called the liberal arts and sciences, and consisted of two branches, the trivium and the quadrivium. The trivium included grammar, rhetoric, and logic; the quadrivium comprehended arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

"These seven heads," says Enfield, "were supposed to include universal knowledge. He who was master of these was thought to have no need of a preceptor to explain any books or to solve any questions which lay within the compass of human reason, the knowledge of the trivium having furnished him with the key to all language, and that of the quadrivium having opened to him the secret laws of nature."

At a period, says the same writer, when few were instructed in the trivium, and very few studied the quadrivium, to be master of both was sufficient to complete the character of a philosopher. The propriety, therefore, of adopting the seven liberal arts and sciences as a symbol of the completion of human learning is apparent. The candidate, having reached this point, is now supposed to have accomplished the task upon which he had entered—he has reached the last step, and is now ready to receive the full fruition of human learning.

So far, then, we are able to comprehend the true symbolism of the winding stairs. They represent the progress of an inquiring mind, with the toils and labors of intellectual cultivation and study, and the preparatory acquisition of all human science, as a preliminary step to the attainment of divine truth, which, it must be remembered, is always symbolized in Masonry by the Word.

Here let me again allude to the symbolism of numbers, which is for the first time presented to the consideration of the Masonic student in the legend of the winding stairs. The theory of numbers as the symbols of certain qualities was originally borrowed by the Masons from the school of Pythagoras. It will be impossible, however, to develop this doctrine, in its entire extent, in the present article, for the numerical symbolism of Masonry would itself constitute materials for an ample essay. It will be sufficient to advert to the fact that the total number of the steps, amounting in all to fifteen in the American system, is a significant symbol. For fifteen was a sacred number among the Orientals, because the letters of the holy name JAH, יהוה, were, in their numerical value, equivalent to fifteen; and hence a figure in which the nine digits were so disposed as to make fifteen either way when added together perpendicularly, horizontally, or diagonally, constituted one of their most sacred talismans. The fifteen steps in the winding stairs are therefore symbolic of the name of God.

But we are not yet done. It will be remembered that a reward was promised for all this toilsome ascent of the winding stairs. Now, what are the wages of a Speculative Mason? Not money, nor corn, nor wine, nor oil. All these are but symbols. His wages are Truth, or that approximation to it which will be most appropriate to the degree into which he has been initiated. It is one of the most beautiful, but at the same time most abstruse, doctrines of the science of Masonic symbolism that the Mason is ever to be in search of truth, but is never to find it. This divine truth, the object of all his labors, is symbolized by the Word, for which we all know he can only obtain a substitute; and this is intended to teach the humiliating but necessary lesson that the knowledge of the nature of God and of man's relation to him, which knowledge constitutes divine truth, can never be acquired in this life. It is only when the portals of the grave open to us, and give us an entrance into a more perfect life, that this knowledge is to be attained. "Happy is the man," says the father of lyric poetry, "who descends beneath the hollow earth, having beheld these mysteries: he knows the end, he knows the origin of life."

The middle chamber is therefore symbolic of this life, where the symbol only of the Word can be given, where the truth is to be reached by approximation only, and yet where we are to learn that that truth will consist in a perfect knowledge of the G. A. O. T. U. This is the reward of the inquiring Mason; in this consist the wages of a Fellow Craft; he is directed to the truth, but must travel farther and ascend still higher to attain it.

It is, then, as a symbol, and a symbol only, that we must study this beautiful legend of the winding stairs. If we attempt to adopt it as a historical fact, the absurdity of its details stares us in the face, and wise men will wonder at our credulity. Its inventors had no desire thus to impose upon our folly; but offering it to us as a great philosophical myth, they did not for a moment suppose that we would pass over its sublime moral teachings to accept the allegory as a historical narrative without meaning, and wholly irreconcilable with the records of Scripture, and opposed by all the principles of probability. To suppose that eighty thousand craftsmen were weekly paid in the narrow precincts of the Temple chambers, is simply to suppose an absurdity. But to believe that all this pictorial representation of an ascent by a winding staircase to the place where the wages of labor were to be received, was an allegory to teach us the ascent of the mind from ignorance, through all the toils of study and the difficulties of obtaining knowledge, receiving here a little and there a little, adding something to the stock of our ideas at each step, until, in the middle chamber of life,—in the full fruition of manhood;—the reward is attained, and the purified and elevated intellect is invested with the reward in the direction how to seek God and God's truth; to believe this, is to believe and to know the true design of Speculative Masonry, the only design which makes it worthy of a good or a wise man's study.

Its historical details are barren, but its symbols and allegories are fertile with instruction.

Wind, Mason's. Among the Masonic tests of the last century was the question, "How blows a Mason's wind?" and the answer was, "Due east and west." Browne gives the question and answer more in extenso, and assigns the explanation as follows:

"How blows the wind in Masonry?"

"Favorable due east and west.

"To what purpose?"

"To call men to, at, and from their labor.

"What does it further allude to?"

"To those miraculous winds which proved so essential in working the happy deliverance of the children of Israel from their Egyptian bondage, and proved the overthrow of Pharaoh and all his host when he attempted to follow them."

Krause very correctly thinks that the fundamental idea of the Masonic wind blowing from the east is to be found in the belief of the Middle Ages that all good things, such as philosophy and religion, came from the East. In the German ritual of The Three Sts. John's Degrees of the Mother Lodge of the Three Globes, the idea is expressed a little differently. The catechism is as follows:

"Whence comes the wind?"

"From the east towards the west, and from the south towards the north, and from the north towards the south, the east, and the west.

"What weather brings it?"

"Variable, hail and storm, and calm and pleasant weather."

The explanation given is, that these changing winds symbolize the changing progress of man's life in his pursuit of knowledge—now clear and full of hope, now dark with storms. Bode's hypothesis that these variable winds of Masonry were intended to refer to the changes of the condition of the Roman church under English monarchs, from Henry VIII. to James II., and thus to connect the symbolism with the Stuart Masonry, is wholly untenable, as the symbol is not found in any of the high degrees. It is not recognized in the French, and is obsolete in the York Rite.

Window. A piece of furniture in the Mark degree. It is a mere symbol, having no foundation in truth, as there was no such appendage to the Temple. It is simply intended to represent the place where the workman received his wages, symbolic of the reward earned by labor.

Wine. One of the elements of Masonic consecration, and, as a symbol of the inward refreshment of a good conscience, is intended, under the name of the "wine of refreshment," to remind us of the eternal refreshments which the good are to receive in the future life for the faithful performance of duty in the present.

Wings of the Cherubim, Extended. The candidate in the degree of Royal Master of the American Rite is said to be received "beneath the extended wings of the cherubim." The expression is derived from the passage in the First Book of Kings (vi. 27), which describes the setting of "the cherubim within the inner house." Practically, there is an anachronism in the reference to the cherubim in this degree. In the older and purer ritual, the ceremonies are supposed to take place in the council-chamber or private apartment of King Solomon, where, of course, there were no cherubim. And even in some more modern rituals, where a part of the ceremony referred to in the tradition is said to have occurred in the holy of holies, that part of the Temple was at that time unfinished, and the cherubim had not yet been placed there. But symbolically the reference to the cherubim in this degree, which represents a searcher for truth, is not objectionable. For although there is a great diversity of opinion as to their exact signification, yet there is a very general agreement that, under some one manifestation or another, they allude to and symbolize the protecting and overshadowing power of the Deity. When, therefore, the initiate is received beneath the extended wings of the cherubim, we are taught by this symbolism how appropriate it is, that he who comes to ask and to seek Truth, symbolized by the True Word, should begin by placing himself under the protection of that Divine Power who alone is Truth, and from whom alone truth can be obtained.

Wisconsin. In January, 1843, Freemasonry was introduced into Wisconsin by the establishment of Mineral Point Lodge at Mineral Point, Melody Lodge at Platteville, and Milwaukee Lodge at Milwaukee, all under the authority of the Grand Lodge of Missouri. December 18, 1843, delegates from these three Lodges assembled in convention at Madison, and organized the Grand Lodge of Wisconsin, Rev. B. T. Kavanaugh, the Master of Melody Lodge, being elected Grand Master.

The Grand Chapter was established February 13, 1850, and Dwight F. Lawton elected Grand High Priest.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was organized in 1857, and James Collins elected Grand Master.

The Grand Commandery was organized October 20, 1859, and Henry L. Palmer elected Grand Commander.

Wisdom. In Ancient Craft Masonry, wisdom is symbolized by the east, the place of light, being represented by the pillar that there supports the Lodge and by the Worshipful Master. It is also referred to King Solomon, the symbolical founder of the Order. In Masonic architecture the Ionic column, distinguished for the skill in its construction, as it combines the beauty of the Corinthian and the strength of the Doric, is adopted as the representative of wisdom.

King Solomon has been adopted in Speculative Masonry as the type or representative of wisdom, in accordance with the character which has been given to him in the First Book of Kings (iv. 30-32): "Solomon's wisdom exceeded the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men; than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman and Chalcol and Darda, the sons of Mahol; and his fame was in all the nations round about."

In all the Oriental philosophies a conspicuous place has been given to wisdom. In the book called the Wisdom of Solomon, (vii. 7, 8,) but supposed to be the production of a Hellenistic Jew, it is said: "I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came to me. I preferred her before sceptres and thrones, and esteemed riches nothing in comparison of her." And farther on in the same book, (vii. 25-27,) she is described as "the breath of the power of God, and a pure influence [emanation] flowing from the glory of the Almighty, . . . the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness."

The Kabbalists made Chochma, חכמה, or Wisdom, the second of the ten Sephiroth, placing it next to the Crown. They called it a male potency, and the third of the Sephiroth, Binah, בינה, or Intelligence, female. These two Sephiroth, with Keter, כתר, or the Crown, formed the first triad, and their union produced the Intellectual World.

The Gnostics also had their doctrine of Wisdom, whom they called Achamoth. They said she was feminine; styled her Mother, and said that she produced all things through the Father.

The Oriental doctrine of Wisdom was, that it is a Divine Power standing between the Creator and the creation, and acting as His agent. "Jehovah," says Solomon, (Proverbs iii. 19,) "by wisdom hath founded the earth." Hence wisdom, in this philosophy, answers to the idea of a vivifying spirit brooding over and impregnating the elements of the chaotic world. In short, the world is but the outward manifestation of the spirit of wisdom.

This idea, so universally diffused throughout the East, is said to have been adopted into the secret doctrine of the Templars, who are supposed to have borrowed much from the Basilideans, the Manicheans, and the Gnostics. From them it easily passed over to the high degrees of Masonry, which were founded on the Templar theory. Hence, in the great decoration of the thirty-third degree of the Scottish Rite, the points of the triple triangle are inscribed with the letters S.A.P.I.E.N.T.I.A., or Wisdom.

It is not difficult now to see how this word Wisdom came to take so prominent a part in the symbolism of Ancient Masonry, and how it was expressly appropriated to King Solomon. As wisdom, in the philosophy of the East, was the creative energy, — the architect, so to speak, of the world, as the emanation of the Supreme Architect, — so Solomon was the architect of the Temple, the symbol of the world. He was to the typical world or temple what wisdom was to the great world of the creation. Hence wisdom is appropriately referred to him and to the Master of the Lodge, who is the representative of Solomon. Wisdom is always placed in the east of the Lodge, because thence emanate all light, and knowledge, and truth.

Withdrawal of Petition. It is a law of Masonry that a petition for initiation having been once presented to a Lodge, cannot be withdrawn. It must be subjected to a ballot. It must be submitted to the action of the Lodge. The rule is founded on prudential reasons. The candidate having submitted his character for inspection, the inspection must be made. It is not for the interests of Masonry, (the only thing to be considered,) that, on the prospect of an unfavorable judgment, he should be permitted to decline the inspection, and have the opportunity of applying to another Lodge, where carelessness or ignorance might lead to his acceptance. Initiation is not like an article of merchandise sold by rival dealers, and to be purchased, after repeated trials, from the most accommodating seller.

Witnesses. See Trials.

Woellner, Johann Christoph Von. A distinguished Prussian statesman, and equally distinguished as one of the leaders of the Rosicrucian Order in Germany, and the Rite of Strict Observance, to whose advancement he lent all the influence of his political position. He was born at Dobritz, May 19, 1732. He studied theology in the orthodox church, and in 1750 was appointed a preacher near Berlin, and afterwards a Canon at Halberstadt. In 1786, King William III., of Prussia, appointed him privy counsellor of finance, an appointment supposed to have been made as a concession to the Rite of Strict Observance, of which Wöllner was a Provincial Grand Master, his Order name being Equus à cubo. In 1788 he became Minister of State, and was put at the head of ecclesiastical affairs. No Mason in Germany labored more assiduously in the cause of the Order and in active defence of the Rite of Strict Observance, and hence he had many enemies as well as friends. On the demise of King William he was dismissed from his political appointments, and retired to his estate at Grosssriez, where he died September 11, 1800.

Wolf. In the Egyptian mysteries, the candidate represented a wolf and wore a wolf's skin, because Osiris once assumed the form of that animal in his contests with Typhon. In the Greek mythology, the wolf was consecrated to Apollo, or the sun, because of the connection between luxe, light, and lukos, a wolf. In French, wolf is louve, and hence the word louveteau, signifying the son of a Mason. See Lewis No. 3.

Wolfenbüttel, Congress of. A city of Lower Saxony, in the principality of Wolfenbüttel, and formerly a possession of the Duke of Brunswick. In 1778 Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick, convoked a Masonic Congress there, with a view of reforming the organization of the Order. Its results, after a session of five weeks, were a union of the Swedish and German Masons, which lasted only for a brief period, and the preparation for a future meeting at Wilhelmsbad.

Woman. The law which excludes women from initiation into Masonry is not contained in the precise words in any of the Old Constitutions, although it is continually implied, as when it is said in the Landsdowne MS., (year 1560,) that the Apprentice must be "of limbs whole, as a man ought to be," and that he must be "no bondman." All the regulations also refer to men only, and many of them would be wholly inapplicable to women. But in the Charges compiled by Anderson and Desaguliers, and published in 1723, the word "woman" is for the first time introduced, and the law is made explicit. Thus it is said that "the persons admitted members of a Lodge must be good and true men, . . . no bondmen, no women," etc.

Perhaps the best reason that can be assigned for the exclusion of women from our Lodges will be found in the character of our organization as a mystic society. Speculative Freemasonry is only an application of the art of Operative Masonry to purposes of morality and science. The Operative branch of our Institution was the fore-runner and origin of the Speculative. Now, as we admit of no innovations or changes in our customs, Speculative Masonry retains, and is governed by, all the rules and regulations that existed in and controlled its Operative prototype. Hence, as in this latter art only hale and hearty men, in possession of all their limbs and members, so that they might endure the fatigues of labor, were employed, so in the former the rule still holds, of excluding all who are not in the possession of these prerequisite qualifications. Woman is not permitted to participate in our rites and ceremonies, not because we deem her unworthy or unfaithful, or incapable, as has been foolishly supposed, of keeping a secret, but because, on our entrance into the Order, we found certain regulations which prescribed that only men capable of enduring the labor, or of fulfilling the duties of Operative Masons, could be admitted. These regulations we have solemnly promised never to alter; nor could they be changed, without an entire disorganization of the whole system of Speculative Masonry.

Wood-cutters, Order of. See Fendeurs.

Woog, Carl Christian. Born at Dresden in 1713, and died at Leipsic, April 24, 1771. Mossdorf says that he was, in 1740, a resident of London, and that there he was initiated into Ancient Craft Masonry, and also into the Scottish degree of Knight of St. Andrew. In 1749, he published a Latin work entitled, Presbyterorum et Diaconorum Achaia de Martyrio Sancti Andreae Apostoli, Epistola Encyclica, in which he refers to the Freemasons (p. 32) in the following language: "Unicum adhuc addo, esse inter cementarios, seu lapicidas liberos, (qui Franco muratoriorum Franc-Maçons nomine communiter insigniuntur quique rotunda quadratis miscere dicuntur,) quosdam qui S. Andreae memoriam summa veneratione recolant. Ad minimum, si scriptis, quæ detecta eorum mysteria et arcana recensent, fides non est deneganda, certum erit, eos quotannis diem quoque Andreas, ut Sancti Johannis diem solent, festum agere atque ceremoniosum celebrare, esseque inter eos sectam aliquam, quæ per crucem, quam in pectore gerant, in qua Sanctus Andreas funibus alligatus hæreat, à reliquis se distinguunt;" i. e., "I add only this, that among the Freemasons (commonly called Franc-Maçons, who are said to mingle circles with squares,) there are certain ones who cherish the memory of St. Andrew with singular veneration. At all events, if we may credit those writings in which their mysteries and secrets are detected and exposed, it will be evident that they are accustomed to keep annually, with ceremonies, the festival of St. Andrew as well as that of St. John; and that there is a sect among them which distinguish themselves from the others by wearing on their breast the cross on which St. Andrew was fastened by cords." Woog, in a subsequent passage, defends the Freemasons from the charge made by these Expositions that they were irreligious, but declares that by him their mysteries shall remain buried in profound silence—"per me vero maneat eorum mysteria alto silentio sepulta." It is apparently from these passages that Mossdorf draws his conclusion that Woog was a Freemason, and had received the Scottish degree of Knight of St. Andrew. They at least prove that he was an early friend of the Institution, and that he must have known something of Ramsay's degree, which was about that time introduced into England.

Word. When emphatically used, the expression, "the Word," is in Masonry always referred to the third degree, although there must be a word in each degree. In this latter and general sense, the Word is called by French Masons "la parole," and by the Germans "ein Wortzeichen." The use of a Word is of great antiquity. We find it in the ancient mysteries. In those of Egypt it is said to have been the Tetragrammaton. The German Stonemasons of the Middle Ages had one, which, however, I think was only a password by which the travelling Companion might make himself known in his professional wanderings. Lyon (Hist of the L. of Edinb., p. 22,) shows that it existed, in the sixteenth and subsequent centuries, in the Scotch Lodges, and he says that "the Word is the only secret that is ever alluded to in the minutes of Mary's Chapel, or in those of Kilwinning, Atcheson's Haven, or Dumblane, or any other that we have examined of a date prior to the erection of the Grand Lodge." Indeed, he thinks that the communication of this Word constituted the only ceremony of initiation practised in the Operative Lodges. At that time there was evidently but one Word for all the ranks of Apprentices, Craftsmen, and Masters. He thinks that this communication of the Mason Word to the Apprentices under oath constituted the germ whence has sprung the Symbolical Masonry. But it must be remembered that the learned and laborious investigations of Bro. Lyon refer only to the Lodges of Scotland. There is no sufficient evidence that a more extensive system of initiation did not prevail at the same time, or even earlier, in England and Germany. Indeed, Findel has shown that it did in the latter country; and it is difficult to believe that the system, which we know was in existence in 1717, was a sudden development out of a single Word, and for which we are indebted to the inventive genius of those who were engaged in the revival at that period. Be this as it may, the evidence is conclusive that everywhere, and from the earliest times, there was a Word. This at least is no modern usage.

But it must be admitted that this Word, whatever it was, was at first a mere mark of recognition. Yet it may have had, and probably did have, a mythical signification, and had not been altogether arbitrarily adopted. The word given in the Sloane MS., No. 3329, which Bro. Hughan places at a date not posterior to 1700, is undoubtedly a corrupted form of that now in use, and with the signification of which we are well acquainted. Hence we may conclude that the legend, and the symbolism connected with it, also existed at the same time, but only in a nascent and incomplete form.

The modern development of Speculative Masonry into a philosophy has given a perfected form to the symbolism of the Word no longer confined to use as a means of recognition, but elevated, in its connection with the legend of the third degree, to the rank of a symbol.

So viewed, and by the scientific Mason it is now only so viewed, the Word becomes the symbol of Divine Truth, the loss of which and the search for it constitute the whole system of Speculative Masonry. So important is this Word, that it lies at the very foundation of the Masonic edifice. The Word might be changed, as might a grip or a sign, if it were possible to obtain the universal consent of the Craft, and Masonry would still remain unimpaired. But were the Word abolished, or released from its intimate connection with the Hiram legend, and with that of the Royal Arch, the whole symbolism of Speculative Masonry would be obliterated. The Institution might withstand such an innovation, but its history, its character, its design, would belong to a newer and a totally different society. The word is what Dermott called the Royal Arch, "the marrow of Masonry."

Word, Lost. See Lost Word.

Word, Mason. In the minutes and documents of the Lodges of Scotland during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, the expression "Mason word" is constantly used. This continuous use would indicate that but one word was then known. Nicolai, in his Essay on the Accusations against the Templars, quotes a "small dictionary published at the beginning of the eighteenth century," in which the "Mason's word" is defined.

Word, Sacred. A term applied to the chief or most prominent word of a degree, to indicate its peculiarly sacred character, in contradistinction to a password, which is simply intended as a mode of recognition. It is sometimes ignorantly corrupted into "secret word." All significant words in Masonry are secret. Only certain ones are sacred.

Word, Significant. See Significant Word.

Word, True. Used in contradistinction to the Lost Word and the Substitute Word. To find it is the object of all Masonic search and labor. For as the Lost Word is the symbol of death, the True Word is the symbol of life eternal. It indicates the change that is always occurring—truth after error, light after darkness, life after death. Of all the symbolism of Speculative Masonry, that of the True Word is the most philosophic and sublime.

Work. See Labor.

Working-Tools. In each of the degrees of Masonry, certain implements of the Operative art are consecrated to the Speculative science, and adopted to teach as symbols lessons of morality. With these the Speculative Mason is taught to erect his spiritual temple, as his Operative predecessors with the same implements constructed their material temples. Hence they are called the working-tools of the degree. They vary but very slightly in the different Rites, but the same symbolism is preserved. The principal working-tools of the Operative art that have been adopted as symbols in the Speculative science, confined, however, to Ancient Craft Masonry, and not used in the higher degrees, are, the twenty-four inch gauge, common gavel, square, level, plumb, skerrit, compasses, pencil, trowel, mallet, pickaxe, crow, and shovel. See them under their respective heads.

Work, Master of the. An architect or superintendent of the building of an edifice. Du Cange (Glossarium) thus defines it: "Magister operis vel operarum vulgo, maitre de l'œuvre, cui operibus publicis vacare incumbit," i. e., "Master of the work or of the works, commonly, maitre de l'œuvre, one whose duty it is to attend to the public works." In the Cooke MS., (line 529,) it is said: "And also he that were most of connyng [skill] scholde be governour of the werke, and scholde be callyd maister." In the old record of the date of Edward III., cited by Anderson in his second edition, (p. 71,) it is prescribed "that Master Masons, or Masters of Work, shall be examined whether they be able of cunning to serve their respective lords." The word was in common use in the Middle Ages, and applied to the Architect or Master Builder of an edifice. Thus Edwin of Steinbach, the architect of the Cathedral of Strasburg, is called Master of the Work. In the monasteries there was a similar officer, who was, however, more generally called the Operarius, but sometimes Magister operis.

Workmen at the Temple. We have no historical account, except the meagre details in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, of the number or classification of the workmen at the Temple of Solomon. The subject has, however, afforded a fertile theme for the exercise of the inventive genius of the ritualists. Although devoid of interest as a historical study, an acquaintance with these traditions, especially the English and American ones, and a comparison of them with the Scriptural account and with that given by Josephus, are necessary as a part of the education of a Masonic student. I furnish the legends, therefore, simply as a matter of curiosity, without the slightest intention to vouch for their authenticity.

In the Second Book of Chronicles, chap. ii., verses 17 and 18, we read as follows:

"And Solomon numbered all the strangers that were in the land of Israel, after the numbering wherewith David his father had numbered them; and they were found an hundred and fifty thousand and three thousand and six hundred.

"And he set threescore and ten thousand of them to be bearers of burdens, and fourscore thousand to be hewers in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people a-work."

The same numerical details are given in the second verse of the same chapter. Again, in the First Book of Kings, chap. v., verses 13 and 14, it is said:

"And King Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men.

"And he sent them to Lebanon, ten thousand a month by courses: a month they were in Lebanon, and two months at home: and Adoniram was over the levy."

The succeeding verses make the same enumeration of workmen as that contained in the Book of Chronicles quoted above, with the exception that, by omitting the three hundred Harodim, or rulers over all, the number of overseers is stated in the Book of Kings to be only three thousand three hundred.

With these authorities, and the assistance of Masonic traditions, Anderson, in the Book of Constitutions, (2d ed., p. 11,) constructs the following table of the Craftsmen at the Temple:

Harodim , Princes, Rulers, or Provosts,	300
Menatzchim , Overseers, or Master Masons,	3,300
Ghiblim , Stone Squarers, } all	80,000
Ischotzeb , Hewers, } Fellow
Benai , Builders, } Crafts,
The levy out of Israel, who were timber cutters,	30,000
All the Freemasons employed in the work of the Temple, exclusive of the two Grand Wardens,	113,600

Besides the Ish Sabal, or men of burthen, the remains of the old Canaanites, amounting to 70,000, who are not numbered among the Masons.

In relation to the classification of these workmen, Anderson says, "Solomon partitioned the Fellow Crafts into certain Lodges, with a Master and Wardens in each, that they might receive commands in a regular manner, might take care of their tools and jewels, might be paid regularly every week, and be duly fed and clothed; and the Fellow Crafts took care of their succession by educating Entered Apprentices."

Josephus makes a different estimate. He includes the 3,300 Overseers in the 80,000 Fellow Crafts, and makes the number of Masons, exclusive of the 70,000 bearers of burthens, amount to only 110,000.

A work published in 1764, entitled The Masonic Pocket-Book, gives a still different classification. The number, according to this authority, was as follows:

Harodim ,	300
Menatzchim ,	3,300
Ghiblim ,	83,000
Adoniram's men ,	30,000
Total,	116,600

which, together with the 70,000 Ish Sabal, or laborers, will make a grand total of 186,600 workmen.

According to the statement of Webb, which has been generally adopted by the Fraternity in the United States, there were:

Grand Masters,	3
Overseers,	3,300
Fellow Crafts,	80,000
Entered Apprentices,	70,000

This account makes no allusion to the 300 Harodim, nor to the levy of 30,000; it is, therefore, manifestly incorrect. Indeed, no certain authority can be found for the complete classification of the workmen, since neither the Bible nor Josephus gives any account of the number of Tyrians employed. Oliver, however, in his Historical Landmarks, has collected from the Masonic traditions an account of the classifications of the workmen, which I shall insert, with a few additional facts taken from other authorities.

According to these traditions, the following was the classification of the Masons who wrought in the quarries of Tyre:

Super Excellent Masons,	6
Excellent Masons,	48
Grand Architects,	8
Architects,	16
Master Masons,	2,376
Mark Masters,	700
Markmen,	1,400
Fellow Crafts,	53,900
Total,	58,454

These were arranged as follows: The six Super Excellent Masons were divided into two Grand Lodges, with three brethren in each to superintend the work. The Excellent Masons were divided into six Lodges of nine each, including one of the Super Excellent Masons, who presided as Master. The eight Grand Architects constituted one Lodge, and the sixteen Architects another. The Grand Architects were the Masters, and the Architects the Wardens, of the Lodges of Master Masons, which were eight in number, and consisted, with their officers, of three hundred in each. The Mark Masters were divided into fourteen Lodges of fifty in each, and the Markmen into fourteen Lodges also, of one hundred in each. The Mark Masters were the Masters, and the Markmen the Wardens, of the Lodges of Fellow Crafts, which were seven hundred in number, and with their officers consisted of eighty in each.

The classification of the workmen in the forest of Lebanon was as follows:

Super Excellent Masons,	3
Excellent Masons,	24
Grand Architects,	4
Architects,	8
Master Masons,	1,188
Mark Masters,	300
Markmen,	600
Fellow Crafts,	23,100
Entered Apprentices,	10,000
Total,	35,227

These were arranged as follows: The three Super Excellent Masons formed one Lodge. The Excellent Masons were divided into three Lodges of nine each, including one of the Super Excellent Masons as Master. The four Grand Architects constituted one Lodge, and the eight Architects another, the former acting as Masters and the latter as Wardens of the Lodges of Master Masons, which were four in number, and consisted, with their officers, of three hundred in each. The Mark Masters were divided into six Lodges of fifty in each, and the Markmen into six Lodges also, of one hundred in each. These two classes presided, the former as Masters and the latter as Wardens, over the Lodges of Fellow Crafts, which were three hundred in number, and were composed of eighty in each, including their officers.

After three years had been occupied in "hewing, squaring, and numbering" the stones, and in "felling and preparing" the timbers, these two bodies of Masons, from the quarries and the forest, united for the purpose of properly arranging and fitting the materials, so that no metallic tool might be required in putting them up, and they were then carried up to Jerusalem. Here the whole body was congregated under the superintending care of Hiram Abif, and to them were added four hundred and twenty Lodges of Tyrian and Sidonian Fellow Crafts, having eighty in each, and the twenty thousand Entered Apprentices of the levy from Israel, who had heretofore been at rest, and who were added to the Lodges of their degree, making them now consist of three hundred in each, so that the whole number then engaged at Jerusalem amounted to two hundred and seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty-one, who were arranged as follows:

9 Lodges of Excellent Masons, 9 in each, were	81
12 Lodges of Master Masons, 300 in each, were	3,600
1,000 Lodges of Fellow Crafts, 80 in each, were	80,000
420 Lodges of Tyrian Fellow Crafts, 80 in each, were	33,600
100 Lodges of Entered Apprentices, 300 in each, were	30,000
70,000 Ish Sabal, or laborers,	70,000
Total,	217,281

Such is the system adopted by our English brethren. The American ritual has greatly simplified the arrangement. According to the system now generally adopted in this country, the workmen engaged in building King Solomon's Temple are supposed to have been classified as follows:

3 Grand Masters.

300 Harodim, or Chief Superintendents, who were Past Masters.

3,300 Overseers, or Master Masons, divided into Lodges of three in each.

80,000 Fellow Crafts, divided into Lodges of five in each.

70,000 Entered Apprentices, divided into Lodges of seven in each.

According to this account, there must have been eleven hundred Lodges of Master Masons; sixteen thousand of Fellow Crafts; and ten thousand of Entered Apprentices. No account is here taken of the levy of thirty thousand who are supposed not to have been Masons, nor of the builders sent by Hiram, king of Tyre, whom the English ritual places at thirty-three thousand six hundred, and most of whom we may suppose to have been members of the Dionysiac Fraternity of Artificers, the institution from which Freemasonry, according to legendary authority, took its origin.

On the whole, the American system seems too defective to meet all the demands of the inquirer into this subject—an objection to which the English is not so obnoxious. But, as I have already observed, the whole account is mythical, and is to be viewed rather as a curiosity than as having any historical value.

Workshop. The French Masons call a Lodge an "atelier," literally, a workshop, or, as Boiste defines it, "a place where Craftsmen work under the same Master."

World. The Lodge is said to be a symbol of the world. Its form—an oblong square, whose greatest length is from east to west—represents the shape of the inhabited world according to the theory of the ancients. The "clouded canopy," or the "starry-decked covering" of the Lodge, is referred to the sky. The sun, which enlightens and governs the world at morning, noon, and evening, is represented by the three superior officers. And, lastly, the Craft, laboring in the work of the Lodge, present a similitude to the inhabitants of the world engaged in the toils of life. While the Lodge is adopted as a copy of the Temple, not less universal is that doctrine which makes it a symbol of the world. See Form of the Lodge.

Worldly Possessions. In the English lectures of Dr. Hemming, the word Tubal Cain is said "to denote worldly possessions," and hence Tubal Cain is adopted in that system as the symbol of worldly possessions. The idea is derived from the derivation of Cain from kanah, to acquire, to gain, and from the theory that Tubal

Cain, by his inventions, had enabled his pupils to acquire riches. But the derivative meaning of the word has reference to the expression of Eve, that in the birth of her eldest son she had acquired a man by the help of the Lord; and any system which gives importance to mere wealth as a Masonic symbol, is not in accord with the moral and intellectual designs of the Institution, which is thus represented as a mere instrument of Mammon. The symbolism is quite modern, and has not been adopted elsewhere than in English Masonry.

Worldly Wealth. Partial clothing is, in Masonry, a symbol teaching the aspirant that Masonry regards no man on account of his worldly wealth or honors; and that it looks not to his outward clothing, but to his internal qualifications.

Worship. Originally, the word "to worship" meant to pay that honor and reverence which are due to one who is worthy. Thus, where our authorized version translates Matthew xix. 19, "Honor thy father and thy mother," Wycliffe says, "Worschip thi fadir and thi modir." And in the marriage service of the Episcopal Church, the expression is still retained, "with my body I thee worship," that is, honor or reverence thee. Hence the still common use in England of the words worshipful and right worshipful as titles of honor applied to municipal and judicial officers. Thus the mayors of small towns, and justices of the peace, are styled "Worshipful," while the mayors of large cities, as London, are called "Right Worshipful." The usage was adopted and retained in Masonry. The word worship, or its derivatives, is not met with in any of the old manuscripts. In the "Manner of constituting a New Lodge," adopted in 1722, and published by Anderson in 1723, the word "worship" is applied as a title to the Grand Master. In the seventeenth century, the guilds of London began to call themselves "Worshipful," as, "the Worshipful Company of Grocers," etc.; and it is likely that the Lodges at the revival, and perhaps a few years before, adopted the same style.

Worshipful. A title applied to a symbolic Lodge and to its Master. The Germans sometimes use the title "hochwürdig." The French style the Worshipful Master "Venerable," and the Lodge, "Respectable."

Worshipful Lodge. See Worshipful.

Worshipful Master. See Worshipful.

Worshipful, Most. The title of a Grand Master and of a Grand Lodge.

Worshipful, Very. Not now in use. It was formerly applied as a title to the Senior and Junior Grand Wardens in the Grand Lodge of South Carolina.

Wren, Sir Christopher. One of the most distinguished architects of England, was the son of Dr. Christopher Wren, Rector of East Knoyle in Wiltshire, and was born there October 20, 1632. He was entered as a gentleman commoner at Wadham College, Oxford, in his fourteenth year, being already distinguished for his mathematical knowledge. He is said to have invented, before this period, several astronomical and mathematical instruments. In 1645, he became a member of a scientific club connected with Gresham College, from which the Royal Society subsequently arose. In 1653, he was elected a Fellow of All Souls' College, and had already become known to the learned men of Europe for his various inventions. In 1657, he removed permanently to London, having been elected Professor of Astronomy at Gresham College.

During the political disturbances which led to the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of the commonwealth, Wren, devoted to the pursuits of philosophy, appears to have kept away from the contests of party. Soon after the restoration of Charles II., he was appointed Savilian Professor at Oxford, one of the highest distinctions which could then have been conferred on a scientific man. During this time he was distinguished for his numerous contributions to astronomy and mathematics, and invented many curious machines, and discovered many methods for facilitating the calculations of the celestial bodies.

Wren was not professionally educated as an architect, but from his early youth had devoted much time to its theoretic study. In 1665 he went to Paris for the purpose of studying the public buildings in that city, and the various styles which they presented. He was induced to make this visit, and to enter into these investigations, because, in 1660, he had been appointed by King Charles II. one of a commission to superintend the restoration of the Cathedral of St. Paul's, which had been much dilapidated during the times of the commonwealth. But before the designs could be carried into execution, the great fire occurred which laid so great a part of London, including St. Paul's, in ashes.

In 1661, he was appointed assistant to Sir John Denham, the Surveyor-General, and directed his attention to the restoration of the burnt portion of the city. His plans were, unfortunately for the good of London, not adopted, and he confined his attention to the rebuilding of particular edifices. In 1667, he was appointed the successor of Denham as Surveyor-General and Chief Architect. In this capacity he erected a large number of churches, the Royal Exchange, Greenwich Observatory, and many other public edifices. But his crowning work, the masterpiece that has given him his largest reputation, is the Cathedral of St. Paul's, which was commenced in 1675 and finished in 1710. The original plan that was proposed by Wren was rejected through the ignorance of the authorities, and differed greatly from the one on which it has been constructed. Wren, however, superintended the erection as master of the work, and his tomb in the crypt of the Cathedral was appropriately inscribed with the words: "Si monumentum requiris, circumspice;" i. e., "If you seek his monument, look around."

In 1672, Wren was made a Knight, and in 1674 he married a daughter of Sir John Coghill. To a son by this marriage are we indebted for memoirs of the family of his father, published under the title of Parentalia. After the death of this wife, he married a daughter of Viscount Fitzwilliam.

In 1680, Wren was elected President of the Royal Society, and continued to a late period his labors on public edifices, building, among others, additions to Hampton Court and to Windsor Castle.

After the death of Queen Anne, who was the last of his royal patrons, Wren was removed from his office of Surveyor-General, which he had held for a period of very nearly half a century. He passed the few remaining years of his life in serene retirement. He was found dead in his chair after dinner, on February 25, 1723, in the ninety-first year of his age.

Notwithstanding that much that has been said by Anderson and other writers of the last century, concerning Wren's connection with Freemasonry, is without historical confirmation, there can, I think, be no doubt that he took a deep interest in the Speculative as well as in the Operative Order. The Rev. J. W. Laughlin, in a lecture on the life of Wren, delivered in 1857, before the inhabitants of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and briefly reported in the Freemasons' Magazine, said that "Wren was for eighteen years a member of the old Lodge of St. Paul's, then held at the Goose and Gridiron, near the Cathedral, now the Lodge of Antiquity; and the records of that Lodge show that the maul and trowel used at the laying of the stone of St. Paul's, together with a pair of carved mahogany candlesticks, were presented by Wren, and are now in possession of that Lodge." By the order of the Duke of Sussex, a plate was placed on the mallet or maul which contained a statement of the fact.

Mr. C. W. King, who is not a Mason, but has derived his statement from a source to which he does not refer, (but which was perhaps Nicolai,) makes, in his work on the Gnostics, (p. 176,) the following statement, which is here quoted merely to show that the traditional belief of Wren's connection with Speculative Freemasonry is not confined to the Craft. He says:

"Another and a very important circumstance in this discussion must always be kept in view: our Freemasons (as at present organized in the form of a secret society) derive their title from a mere accidental circumstance connected with their actual establishment. It was in the Common Hall of the London Gild of Freemasons (the trade) that their first meetings were held under Christopher Wren, president, in the time of the Commonwealth. Their real object was political—the restoration of monarchy; hence the necessary exclusion of the public, and the oaths of secrecy enjoined on the members. The pretence of promoting architecture, and the choice of the place where to hold their meetings, suggested by the profession of their president, were no more than blinds to deceive the existing government."

Anderson, in the first edition of the Constitutions, makes but a slight reference to Wren, only calling him "the ingenious architect, Sir Christopher Wren." I am almost afraid that this passing notice of him who has been called "the Vitruvius of England" must be attributed to servility. George I. was the stupid monarch who removed Wren from his office of Surveyor-General, and it would not do to be too diffuse with praise of one who had been marked by the disfavor of the king. But in 1727 George I. died, and in his second edition, published in 1738, Anderson gives to Wren all the Masonic honors to which he claims that he was entitled. It is from what Anderson has said in that work, that the Masonic writers of the last century and the first half of the present, not requiring the records of authentic history, have drawn their views of the official relations of Wren to the Order. He first introduces Wren (p. 101) as one of the Grand Wardens at the General Assembly held December 27, 1663, when the Earl of St. Albans was Grand Master, and Sir John Denham, Deputy Grand Master. He says that in 1666 Wren was again a Grand Warden, under the Grand Mastership of the Earl of Rivers; but immediately afterwards he calls him "Deputy Wren," and continues to give him the title of Deputy Grand Master until 1685, when he says (p. 106) that "the Lodges met, and elected Sir Christopher Wren Grand Master, who appointed Mr. Gabriel Cibber and Mr. Edmund Savage Grand Wardens; and while carrying on St. Paul's, he annually met those brethren who could attend him, to keep up good old usages." Anderson (p. 107) makes the Duke of Richmond and Lennox Grand Master, and reduces Wren to the rank of a Deputy; but he says that in 1698 he was again chosen Grand Master, and as such "celebrated the Cape-stone" of St. Paul's in 1708. "Some few years after this," he says, "Sir Christopher Wren neglected the office of Grand Master." Finally, he says (p. 109) that in 1716 "the Lodges in London finding themselves neglected by Sir Christopher Wren," Masonry was revived under a new Grand Master. Some excuse for the aged architect's neglect might have been found in the fact that he was then eighty-five years of age, and had been long removed from his public office of Surveyor-General.

Noorthouck is more considerate. Speaking of the placing of the last stone on the top of St. Paul's, — which, notwithstanding the statement of Anderson, was done, not by Wren, but by his son, — he says, (Constitutions, p. 204,) "the age and infirmities of the Grand Master, which prevented his attendance on this solemn occasion, confined him afterwards to great retirement; so that the Lodges suffered from want of his usual presence in visiting and regulating their meetings, and were reduced to a small number."

Noorthouck, however, repeats substantially the statements of Anderson in reference to Wren's Grand Mastership. How much of these statements can be authenticated by history is a question that must be decided only by more extensive investigations of documents not yet in possession of the Craft. Findel says (Hist., p. 127,) that Anderson, having been commissioned in 1735 by the Grand Lodge to make a list of the ancient Patrons of the Masons, so as to afford something like a historical basis, "transformed the former Patrons into Grand Masters, and the Masters and Superintendents into Grand Wardens and the like, which were unknown until the year 1717."

Of this there can be no doubt; but there is other evidence that Wren was a Freemason. In Aubrey's Natural History of Wiltshire, (p. 277,) a manuscript in the library of the Royal Society, Halliwell finds and cites, in his Early History of Freemasonry in England, (p. 46,) the following passage:

"This day, May the 18th, being Monday, 1691, after Rogation Sunday, is a great convention at St. Paul's Church of the fraternity of the Adopted Masons, where Sir Christopher Wren is to be adopted a Brother, and Sir Henry Goodric of the Tower, and divers others. There have been kings that have been of this sodality."

If this statement be true, — and we have no reason to doubt it, from Aubrey's general antiquarian accuracy, — Anderson is incorrect in making him a Grand Master in 1685, six years before he was initiated as a Freemason. The true version of the story probably is this: Wren was a great architect — the greatest at the time in England. As such he received the appointment of Deputy Surveyor-General under Denham, and subsequently, on Denham's death, of Surveyor-General. He thus became invested, by virtue of his office, with the duty of superintending the construction of public buildings. The most important of these was St. Paul's Cathedral, the building of which he directed in person, and with so much energy that the parsimonious Duchess of Marlborough, when contrasting the charges of her own architect with the scanty remuneration of Wren, observed that "he was content to be dragged up in a basket three or four times a week to the top of St. Paul's, and at great hazard, for £200 a year." All this brought him into close connection with the gild of Freemasons, of which he naturally became the patron, and subsequently he was by initiation adopted into the sodality. Wren was, in fact, what the mediæval Masons called Magister Operis, or Master of the Work. Anderson, writing for a purpose, naturally transformed this title into that of Grand Master — an office supposed to be unknown until 1717. Aubrey's authority sufficiently establishes the fact that Wren was a Freemason, and the events of his life prove his attachment to the profession.

Wrestle. A degree sometimes called the "Mark and Link," or Wrestle. It was formerly connected with the Mark degree in England. Its ceremonies were founded on the passage contained in Genesis xxxii. 24–30.

Writing. The law which forbids a Mason to commit to writing the esoteric parts of the ritual is exemplified in some American Lodges by a peculiar ceremony; but the usage is not universal. The Druids had a similar rule; and we are told that they, in keeping their records, used the letters of the Greek alphabet, so that they might be unintelligible to those who were not authorized to read them.

Wykeham, William of. Bishop of Winchester. Born at Wykeham in Hampshire in 1324, and died in 1404. He was eminent both as an ecclesiastic and statesman. In 1359, before he reached the episcopate, Edward III. appointed him surveyor of the works at Windsor, which castle he rebuilt. In his warrant or commission, he was invested with power "to appoint all workmen, to provide materials, and to order everything relating to building and repairs." He was, in fact, what the old manuscript Constitutions call "The Lord," under whom were the Master Masons. Anderson says that he was at the head of four hundred Freemasons, was Master of Work under Edward III., and Grand Master under Richard II. And the Freemasons' Magazine (August, 1796,) styles him "one of the brightest ornaments that Freemasonry has ever boasted." In this there is, of course, a mixture of myth and history. Wykeham was an architect as well as a bishop, and superintended the building of many public edifices in England in the fourteenth century, being a distinguished example of the connection so common in mediæval times between the ecclesiastics and the Masons.

Wyseacre. The Leland MS., referring to Pythagoras, says that, "wynnyng entraunce yn al Lodges of Maconnes, he lerned muche, and retournedde and worked yn Grecia Magna wachsynge, and becomynge a mightye wyseacre." The word wiseacre, which now means a dunce or silly person, is a corruption of the German weis-sager, and originally signified a wise sayer or philosopher, in which sense it is used in the passage cited.

X.

Xaintrailles, Madame de. A lady who was initiated into Masonry by a French Lodge that did not have the excuse for this violation of law that we must accord to the Irish one in the case of Miss St. Leger. Clavel (Hist. Pittoresq., p. 34,) tells the story, but does not give the date, though it must have been about the close of the last century. The law of the Grand Orient of France required each Lodge of Adoption to be connected with and placed under the immediate guardianship of a regular Lodge of Masons. It was in one of these guardian Lodges that the female initiation which we are about to describe took place. The Lodge of "Frères-Artistes," at Paris, over which Brother Cuvelier de Trie presided as Master, was about to give what is called a Fête of Adoption, that is, to open a Lodge for female Masonry, and initiate candidates into that rite. Previous, however, to the introduction of the female members, the brethren opened a regular Lodge of Ancient Masonry in the first degree. Among the visitors who waited in the antechamber for admission was a youthful officer in the uniform of a captain of cavalry. His diploma or certificate was requested of him by the member deputed for the examination of the visitors, for the purpose of having it inspected by the Lodge. After some little hesitation, he handed the party asking for it a folded paper, which was immediately carried to the Orator of the Lodge, who, on opening it, discovered that it was the commission of an aide-de-camp, which had been granted by the Directory to the wife of General de Xaintrailles, a lady who, like several others of her sex in those troublous times, had donned the masculine attire and gained military rank at the point of the sword. When the nature of the supposed diploma was made known to the Lodge, it may readily be supposed that the surprise was general. But the members were Frenchmen: they were excitable and they were gallant; and consequently, in a sudden and exalted fit of enthusiasm, which as Masons we cannot excuse, they unanimously determined to confer the first degree, not of Adoption, but of regular and legitimate Freemasonry, on the brave woman who had so often exhibited every manly virtue, and to whom her country had on more than one occasion committed trusts requiring the greatest discretion and prudence as well as courage. Madame de Xaintrailles was made acquainted with the resolution of the Lodge, and her acquiescence in its wishes requested. To the offer, she replied, "I have been a man for my country, and I will again be a man for my brethren." She was forthwith introduced and initiated as an Entered Apprentice, and repeatedly afterwards assisted the Lodge in its labors in the first degree.

Doubtless the Irish Lodge was, under all the circumstances, excused, if not justified, in the initiation of Miss St. Leger. But for the reception of Madame de Xaintrailles we look in vain for the slightest shadow of an apology. The outrage on their obligations as Masons, by the members of the Parisian Lodge, richly merited the severest punishment, which ought not to have been averted by the plea that the offence was committed in a sudden spirit of enthusiasm and gallantry.

Xavier Mier à Campello, Francisco. He was Bishop of Almeria, and Inquisitor-General of Spain, and an ardent persecutor of the Freemasons. In 1815, Ferdinand VII. having re-established the Inquisition in Spain and suppressed the Masonic Lodges, Xavier published the bull of Pius VII., against the Order, in an ordinance of his own, in which he denounced the Lodges as "Societies which lead to sedition, to independence, and to all errors and crimes." He threatened the utmost rigors of the civil and canon laws against all who did not, within the space of fifteen days, renounce them; and then instituted a series of persecutions of the most atrocious character. Many of the most distinguished persons of Spain were arrested, and imprisoned in the dungeons of the Inquisition, on the charge of being "suspected of Freemasonry."

Xerophagists. On the 28th of April, 1748, Pope Clement XII. issued his bull forbidding the practice of Freemasonry by the members of the Roman Catholic Church. Many of the Masons of Italy continued, however, to meet; but, for the purpose of escaping the temporal penalties of the bull, which extended, in some cases, to the infliction of capital punishment, they changed their esoteric name, and called themselves Xerophagists. This is a compound of two Greek words signifying "eaters of dry food," and by it they alluded to an engagement into which they entered to abstain from the drinking of wine. They were, in fact, the first temperance society on record. Thory says (Act. Lat., i. 346,) that a manuscript concerning them was contained in the collection of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

Xerxes. A significant word in the degree of Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret, the thirty-second of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. He is referred to in the old rituals of that degree as represented by Frederick the Great, the supposed founder of the Rite. Probably this is on account of the great military genius of both.

Xinxé. A significant word in the high degrees. Delaunay (Tuileur, p. 49,) gives it as Xincheu, and says that it has been translated as "the seat of the soul." But in either form it has evidently undergone such corruption as to be no longer comprehensible.

Y.

Y. One of the symbols of Pythagoras was the Greek letter Upsilon, Υ , for which, on account of the similarity of shape, the Romans adopted the letter Y of their own alphabet. Pythagoras said that the two horns of the letter symbolized the two different paths of virtue and vice, the right branch leading to the former and the left to the latter. It was therefore called "Litera Pythagoræ," the letter of Pythagoras. Thus the Roman poet Martial says, in one of his epigrams:

"Litera Pythagoræ, discrimine secta bicorni, Humanæ vitæ speciem præferre videtur."
i. e.,

"The letter of Pythagoras, parted by its two-branched division, appears to exhibit the image of human life."

Yates, Giles Fonda. The task of writing a sketch of the life of Giles Fonda

Yates is accompanied with a feeling of melancholy, because it brings to my mind the recollections of years, now passed forever, in which I enjoyed the intimate friendship of that amiable man and zealous Mason and scholar. His gentle mien won the love, his virtuous life the esteem, and his profound but unobtrusive scholarship the respect, of all who knew him.

Giles Fonda Yates was born in 1796, in what was then the village of Schenectady, in the State of New York. After acquiring at the ordinary schools of the period a preliminary liberal education, he entered Union College, and graduated with distinction, receiving in due time the degree of Master of Arts.

He subsequently commenced the study of the law, and, having been admitted to the bar, was, while yet young, appointed Judge of Probate in Schenectady, the duties of which office he discharged with great ability and fidelity.

Being blessed with a sufficient competency of the world's goods, (although in the latter years of his life he became poor,) Bro. Yates did not find it necessary to pursue the practice of the legal profession as a source of livelihood.

At an early period, he was attracted, by the bent of his mind, to the study not only of general literature, but especially to that of archaeology, philosophy, and the occult sciences, of all of which he became an ardent investigator. These studies led him naturally to the Masonic institution, into which he was initiated in the year 1817, receiving the degrees of Symbolic Masonry in St. George's Lodge, No. 6, at Schenectady. In 1821 he affiliated with Morton Lodge, No. 87, of the same place, and was shortly afterwards elected its Senior Warden. Returning subsequently to the Lodge of his adoption, he was chosen as its Master in 1844. He had in the meantime been admitted into a Chapter of the Royal Arch and an Encampment of Knights Templars; but his predilections being for Scottish Masonry, he paid but little attention to these high degrees of the American Rite.

The following extract from an address delivered by him in 1851, before the Supreme Council of the Northern Jurisdiction, contains a brief summary of a portion of his labors in the cause of Scottish Masonry.

"I turned my attention," says Bro. Yates, "to the history of the Sublime degrees very soon after my initiation as a Mason. My intercourse, in 1822, with several old Masons in the city of Albany, led to the discovery that an Ineffable Lodge of Perfection had been established in that ancient city on the 20th of December, 1767. I also discovered that not only the Ineffable but the Superior degrees of our Rite had been conferred at the same time on a chosen few by the founder of the Lodge, Henry A. Francken, one of the Deputies of Stephen Morin of glorious memory. It was not long, moreover, before I found the original Warrants of this Lodge, its Book of Minutes, the Patents of Ill. Bros. Samuel Stringer, M. D., Jeremiah Van Rensselaer, and Peter W. Yates, Esquires, Deputy Inspectors General under the old system; also the Regulations and Constitutions of the nine Commissioners, etc., 1761, and other documents that had been left by Bro. Francken with the Albany brethren when he founded their Lodge. With the concurrence of the surviving members of said Lodge in Albany, Dr. Jonathan Eights and the Hon. and R. W. Stephen Van Rensselaer, P. G. M. of the Grand Lodge of New York, I aided in effecting its revival. The necessary proceedings were then instituted to place the same under the superintendence of a Grand Council of Princes of Jerusalem, as required by the Old Constitutions; and such Grand Council was subsequently opened in due form in said city.

"Having been made aware of the 'New Constitutions of the Thirty-third Degree,' ratified on the 1st of May, 1786, conferring the supreme power over our Rite on 'Councils of Nine Brethren,' I hastened to place myself in correspondence with Moses Holbrook, M. D., at the time Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council at Charleston, and with my esteemed friends, Joseph McCosh, Illustrious Grand Secretary General of the last-named Council, and Bro. Gourgas, at that time Illustrious Grand Secretary General of the H. E. for this Northern Jurisdiction. Lodges of Perfection in the counties of Montgomery, Onondaga, Saratoga, and Mourue, in the State of New York, were successively organized and placed, agreeably to the Constitutions, under the superintendence of the Grand Council before named. The establishment of this last-named body was confirmed, and all our proceedings in Sublime Freemasonry were legalized and sanctioned by the only lawful authorities in the United States, the aforesaid Supreme Councils.

"On the 16th day of November, 1824, I received a Patent appointing me S. of S. of a Consistory of S. P. of the R. S. established in the city of Albany.

"In 1825, I took my vows, as a 'Sovereign Grand Inspector General,' between the hands of our said Brother Joseph McCosh, he having been specially deputed for that purpose. I was shortly after constituted and accredited the Representative of the Southern Supreme Grand Council near the Northern Supreme Grand Council, of which last I was made and ever since have been a member."

In 1851, he was elected Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction, but soon after resigned the office in favor of Edward A. Raymond. As he at that time had removed his residence to the city of New York, he was immediately appointed Deputy Inspector for the State, and afterwards was elected Grand Commander of Cosmopolitan Sovereign Consistory of the State of New York.

The last years of his life were oppressed with poverty, and he was compelled to accept a subordinate office in the Custom-House of New York, where, in my visits to that city, I often beheld him faithfully laboring at his desk on tasks which I painfully felt were uncongenial to his cultivated intellect. He died December 13, 1859, in the city of New York.

Bro. Yates was the author of a work entitled History of the Manners and Ceremonies of the Indian Tribes, in which he seeks ingeniously, if not satisfactorily, to discover a Masonic meaning in the Indian mystic rites. He was also engaged for many years in the compilation of a valuable Repertorium of Masonry, a work the manuscript of which he left unfinished at the time of his death. But most of his Masonic writings appeared in contemporary journals. Moore's Freemasons' Magazine and Mackey's Masonic Quarterly Review contain valuable communications from his pen on subjects of Masonic archæology, in which science he had no superior. He was also a poet of no mean pretension, as his Odes of Perfection sufficiently show.

In an address delivered before the Lodge of Sorrow held by the New York Lodge of Perfection on the occasion of his demise, Bro. Charles T. McClenachan has paid to Giles F. Yates this true and appropriate tribute:

"In the latter years of his life, this illustrious Brother,—so just, so pure, so firm in mind, so unobtrusive, and yet so deeply wrapt in the one great ideal of Perfection, known by Masonic reputation around the wide world,—passed daily unheeded from the tediousness of duty to the pleasures of study; never forsaking the one great object of his life—the solving of the Mysteries, the searching after Truth. Active, thoughtful, penetrating, his whole soul ever centered in a grasping desire to comprehend the fulness of the Great Intelligence, the Rouach Elohim, or Divine Existence—his bright ideal of Perfection which dwells not on earth—he has now found full relief in death and the certain knowledge of the Divine reality."

But the subject of this sketch has himself frankly and honestly, as was ever his wont, described his own character:

"I would fain have you believe, my dear brethren," said he, "that, as a member of the Masonic institution, if I have had any ambition, it has been to study its science, and to discharge my duties as a faithful Mason, rather than to obtain its official honors or personal benefits of any kind. Self-aggrandizement has never formed any part of my Masonic creed, and all who know me can bear witness that it never has of my practice."

The motto he had selected was "prodesse quam conspici," to do good rather than to be conspicuous, and to that sentiment he was consistently faithful throughout his well-spent life.

Yaveron Hamaim. A significant word in the high degrees. The French rituals explain it as meaning "the passage of the river," and refer it to the crossing of the river Euphrates by the liberated Jewish captives on their return from Babylon to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple. It is in its present form a corruption of the Hebrew sentence, יעברו המים, yavaru hamaim, which signifies "they will cross, or pass over, the waters," alluding to the streams lying between Babylon and Jerusalem, of which the Euphrates was the most important.

Year, Hebrew. The same as the Year of the World, which see.

Year of Light. Anno Lucis, in the year of light, is the epoch used in Masonic documents of the Symbolic degrees. This era is calculated from the creation of the world, and is obtained by adding four thousand to the current year, on the supposition that Christ was born four thousand years after the creation of the world. But the chronology of Archbishop Usher, which has been adopted as the Bible chronology in the authorized version, places the birth of Christ in the year 4004 after the creation. According to this calculation, the Masonic date for the "year of light" is four years short of the true date, and the year of the Lord 1874, which in Masonic documents is 5874, should correctly be 5878. The Ancient and Accepted Masons in the beginning of this century used this correct or Usherian era, and the Supreme Council at Charleston dated their first circular, issued in 1802, as 5806. Dalcho (Ahim. Rez., 2d ed., p. 37,) says: "If Masons are determined to fix the origin of their Order at the time of the creation, they should agree among themselves at what time before Christ to place that epoch." At that agreement they have now arrived. Whatever differences may have once existed, there is now a general consent to adopt the incorrect theory that the world was created 4000 B. C. The error is too unimportant, and the practice too universal, to expect that it will ever be corrected.

Noorthouck, (Constitutions, p. 5,) speaking of the necessity of adding the four years to make a correct date, says: "But this being a degree of accuracy that Masons in general do not attend to, we must, after this intimation, still follow the vulgar mode of computation to be intelligible."

As to the meaning of the expression, it is by no means to be supposed that Masons, now, intend by such a date to assume that their Order is as old as the creation. It is simply used as expressive of reverence for that physical light which was created by the fiat of the Grand Architect, and which is adopted as the type of the intellectual light of Masonry. The phrase is altogether symbolic.

Year of Masonry. Sometimes used as synonymous with Year of Light. In the last century, it was in fact the more frequent expression.

Year of the Deposit. An era adopted by Royal and Select Masters, and refers to the time when certain important secrets were deposited in the first Temple. See Anno Depositionis.

Year of the Discovery. An era adopted by Royal Arch Masons, and refers to the time when certain secrets were made known to the Craft at the building of the second Temple. See Anno Inventionis.

Year of the Order. The date used in documents connected with Masonic Templarism. It refers to the establishment of the Order of Knights Templars in the year 1118. See Anno Ordinis.

Year of the World. This is the era adopted by the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and is borrowed from the Jewish computation. The Jews formerly used the era of contracts, dated from the first conquests of Seleucus Nicator in Syria. But since the fifteenth century they have counted from the creation, which they suppose to have taken place in September, 3760 before Christ. See Anno Mundi.

Yeas and Nays. The rule existing in all parliamentary bodies that a vote may be called for "by yeas and nays," so that the vote of each member may be known and recorded, does not apply to Masonic Lodges. Indeed, such a proceeding would be unnecessary. The vote by yeas and nays in a representative body is taken that the members may be held responsible to their constituents. But in a Lodge, each member is wholly independent of any responsibility, except to his own conscience. To call for the yeas and nays being then repugnant to the principles which govern Lodges, to call for them would be out of order, and such a call could not be entertained by the presiding officer.

But in a Grand Lodge the responsibility of the members to a constituency does exist, and there it is very usual to call for a vote by Lodges, when the vote of every member is recorded. Although the mode of calling for the vote is different, the vote by Lodges is actually the same as a vote by yeas and nays, and may be demanded by any member.

Yeldis. An old hermetic degree, which Thory says was given in some secret societies in Germany.

Yellow. Of all the colors, yellow seems to be the least important and the least general in Masonic symbolism. In other institutions it would have the same insignificance, were it not that it has been adopted as the representative of the sun, and of the noble metal gold. Thus, in colored blazonry, the small dots, by which the gold in an engraved coat of arms is designated, are replaced by the yellow color. La Colombiere, a French heraldic writer, says, (Science Heroique, p. 30,) in remarking on the connection between gold and yellow, that as yellow, which is derived from the sun, is the most exalted of colors, so gold is the most noble of metals. Portal (Des Couleurs Symboliques, p. 64,) says that the sun, gold, and yellow are not synonymous, but mark different degrees which it is difficult to define. The natural sun was the symbol of the spiritual sun, gold represented the natural sun, and yellow was the emblem of gold. But it is evident that yellow derives all its significance as a symbolic color from its connection with the hue of the rays of the sun and the metal gold.

Among the ancients, the divine light or wisdom was represented by yellow, as the divine heat or power was by red. And this appears to be about the whole of the ancient symbolism of this color.

In the old ritual of the Scottish and hermetic degree of Knight of the Sun, yellow was the symbol of wisdom darting its rays, like the yellow beams of the morning, to enlighten a waking world. In the Prince of Jerusalem, it was also formerly the characteristic color, perhaps with the same meaning, in reference to the elevated position that that degree occupied in the Rite of Perfection, and afterwards in the Ancient and Accepted Rite.

Thirty or forty years ago, yellow was the characteristic color of the Mark Master's degree, derived, perhaps, from the color of the Princes of Jerusalem, who originally issued charters for Mark Lodges; for it does not seem to have possessed any symbolic meaning.

In fact, as I have already intimated, all the symbolism of yellow must be referred to and explained by the symbolism of gold and of the sun, of which it is simply the representative.

Yellow Jacket. Prichard says that in the early part of the last century the following formed a part of the catechism:

"Have you seen your Master to-day?"

"Yes."

"How was he clothed?"

"In a yellow jacket and a blue pair of breeches."

And he explains it by saying that "the yellow jacket is the compasses, and the blue breeches the steel points."

On this Krause (Kunsturk., ii. 78,) remarks that this sportive comparison is altogether in the puerile spirit of the peculiar interrogatories which are found among many other crafts, and is without doubt genuine as originating in the working Lodges. Prichard's explanation is natural, and Krause's remark correct. But it is vain to attempt to elevate the idea by attaching to it a symbolism of gold and azure—the blue sky and the meridian sun. No such thought entered into the minds of the illiterate operatives with whom the question and answer originated.

Yevele, Henry. He was one of the Magistri Operis, or Masters of the Work, in the reign of Edward III., for whom he constructed several public edifices. Anderson says that he is called, "in the Old Records, the King's Freemason;" but his name does not occur in any of the old manuscript Constitutions that are now extant.

Yggrasil. The sacred ash-tree of the Scandinavian mysteries, which Oliver says was analogous to the mystical ladder of other Rites. If so, the symbolism is very abstruse.

Y-ha-ho. Higgins (Anacalypsis, ii. 17,) cites the Abbé Bazin as saying that this was the name esteemed most sacred among the ancient Egyptians. Clement of Alexandria asserts, in his Stromata, that all those who entered into the temple of Serapis were obliged to wear conspicuously on their persons the name I-ha-ho, which he says signifies the Eternal God. The resemblance to the Tetragrammaton is apparent.

Yod. The Hebrew letter י, equivalent in sound to I or Y. It is the initial letter of the word יְהוָה, or Jehovah, the Tetragrammaton, and hence was peculiarly sacred among the Talmudists. Basnage, (lib. iii., c. 13,) while treating of the mysteries of the name Jehovah among the Jews, says of this letter:

"The yod in Jehovah is one of those things which eye hath not seen, but which has been concealed from all mankind. Its essence and matter are incomprehensible; it is not lawful so much as to meditate upon it. Man may lawfully revolve his thoughts from one end of the heavens to the other, but he cannot approach that inaccessible light, that primitive existence, contained in the letter yod; and indeed the masters call the letter thought or idea, and prescribe no bounds to its efficacy. It was this letter which, flowing from the primitive light, gave being to emanations. It wearied itself by the way, but assumed a new vigor by the sense of the letter ך, which makes the second letter of the Ineffable Name."

In Symbolic Masonry, the yod has been replaced by the letter G. But in the high degrees it is retained, and within a triangle, thus, constitutes the symbol of the Deity.

Yoni. Among the Orientalists, the yoni was the female symbol corresponding to the lingam, or male principle. The lingam and yoni of the East assumed the names of Phallus and Cteis among the Greeks.

York Constitutions. This document, which is also called Krause's MS., purports to be the Constitutions adopted by the General Assembly of Masons that was held at York in 926. (See York Legend.) No original manuscript copy of it can be found, but a German translation from a Latin version was published, for the first time, by Krause in Die drei ältesten Kunsturkunden der Freimaurerbrüderschaft. It will be found in the third edition of that work, (vol. iii., pp. 58–101.) Krause's account of it is, that it was translated from the original, which is said, in a certificate dated January 4, 1806, and signed "Stonehouse," to have been written on parchment in the ancient language of the country, and preserved at the city of York, "apud Rev. summam societatem architectonicam," which Woodford translates "an architectural society," but which is evidently meant for the "Grand Lodge." From this Latin translation a German version was made in 1808 by Bro. Schneider of Altenberg, the correctness of which, having been examined by three linguists, is certified by Carl Erdmann Weller, Secretary of the Government Tribunal of Saxony. And it is this certified German translation that has been published by Krause in his Kunsturkunden. An English version was inserted by Bro. Hughan in his Old Charges of British Freemasons. The document consists, like all the old manuscripts, of an introductory invocation, a history of architecture or the "Legend of the Craft," and the general statutes or charges; but several of the charges differ from those in the other Constitutions. There is, however, a general resemblance sufficient to indicate a common origin. The appearance of this document gave rise in Germany to discussions as to its authenticity. Krause, Schneider, Fessler, and many other distinguished Masons, believed it to be genuine; while Kloss denied it, and contended that the Latin translation which was certified by Stonehouse had been prepared before 1806, and that in preparing it an ancient manuscript had been remodelled on the basis of the 1738 edition of Anderson's Constitutions, because the term "Noachida" is employed in both, but is found nowhere else. At length, in 1864, Bro. Findel was sent by the "Society of German Masons" to England to discover the original. His report of his journey was that it was negative in its results; no such document was to be found in the archives of the old Lodge at York, and no such person as Stonehouse was known in that city. These two facts, to which may be added the further arguments that no mention is made of it in the Fabric Rolls of York Minster, published by the Surtees Society, nor in the inventory of the Grand Lodge of York which was extant in 1777, nor by Drake in his speech delivered before the Grand Lodge in 1726, and a few other reasons, have led Findel to agree with Kloss that the document is not a genuine York Charter. Such, too, is the general opinion of English Masonic scholars. There can be little doubt that the General Assembly at York, in 926, did frame a body of laws or Constitutions; but there is almost as little doubt that they are not represented by the Stonehouse or Krause document.

York Legend. The city of York, in the north of England, is celebrated for its traditional connection with Masonry in that kingdom. No topic in the history of Freemasonry has so much engaged the attention of modern Masonic scholars, or given occasion to more discussion, than the alleged facts of the existence of Masonry in the tenth century at the city of York as a prominent point, of the calling of a congregation of the Craft there in the year 926, of the organization of a General Assembly and the adoption of a Constitution. During the whole of the last and the greater part of the present century, the Fraternity in general have accepted all of these statements as genuine portions of authentic history; and the adversaries of the Order have, with the same want of discrimination, rejected them all as myths; while a few earnest seekers for truth have been at a loss to determine what part was historical and what part legendary. Recently, the discovery of many old manuscripts has directed the labors of such scholars as Hughan, Woodford, Lyon, and others, to the critical examination of the early history of Masonry, and that of York has particularly engaged their attention.

For a thorough comprehension of the true merits of this question, it will be necessary that the student should first acquaint himself with what was, until recently, the recognized theory as to the origin of Masonry at York, and then that he should examine the newer hypotheses advanced by the writers of the present day. In other words, he must read both the tradition and the history.

In pursuance of this plan, I propose to commence with the legends of York Masonry, as found in the old manuscript Constitutions, and then proceed to a review of what has been the result of recent investigations. It may be premised that, of all those who have subjected these legends to the crucible of historical criticism, Brother William James Hughan of Cornwall, in England, must unhesitatingly be acknowledged as "facile princeps," the ablest, the most laborious, and the most trustworthy investigator. He was the first and the most successful remover of the cloud of tradition which so long had obscured the sunlight of history.

The legend which connects the origin of English Masonry at York in 926 is sometimes called the "York Legend," sometimes the "Athelstane Legend," because the General Assembly, said to have been held there, occurred during the reign of that king; and sometimes the "Edwin Legend," because that prince is supposed to have been at the head of the Craft, and to have convoked them together to form a Constitution.

The earliest extant of the old manuscript Constitutions is the ancient poem commonly known as the Halliwell MS., and the date of which is conjectured (on good grounds) to be about the year 1390. In that work we find the following version of the legend:

"Thys craft com ynto Englonde as y yow say,
Yn tyme of good kynge Adelstonus' day;
He made tho bothe halle and eke bowre,
And hye templus of gret honowre,
To sportyn him yn bothe day and nyght,
An to worschepe hys God with alle hys mygth.
Thys goode lord loved thys craft ful wel,
And purposed to strenthyn hyt every del,
For dyvers defawtys that yn the craft he fonde;
He sende aboute ynto the londe
After alle the masonus of the crafte,
To come to hym ful evene straifte,
For to amende these defawtys alle
By good conseil gef hyt mygth falle.
A semblé thenne he cowthe let make
Of dyvers lordis yn here state
Dukys, erlys, and barnes also,
Knyghthys, sqwyers and mony mo,
And the grete burges of that syté,
They were ther alle yn here degré;
These were there uchon algate,
To ordeyne for these masonus astate,
Ther they sowgton by here wytte
How they mygthyn governe hytte:
Fyftene artyculus they there sowgton,
And fyftene poyntys ther they wrogton."

For the benefit of those who are not familiar with this archaic style, the passage is translated into modern English.

"This craft came into England, as I tell you, in the time of good king Athelstan's reign; he made then both hall, and also bower and lofty temples of great honor, to take his recreation in both day and night, and to worship his God with all his might. This good lord loved this craft full well, and purposed to strengthen it in every part on account of various defects that he discovered in the craft. He sent about into all the land, after all the masons of the craft, to come straight to him, to amend all these defects by good counsel, if it might so happen. He then permitted an assembly to be made of divers lords in their rank, dukes, earls, and barons, also knights, squires, and many more, and the great burgesses of that city, they were all there in their degree; these were there, each one in every way to make laws for the estate of these masons. There they sought by their wisdom how they might govern it; there they found out fifteen articles, and there they made fifteen points."

The next old document in which we find this legend recited is that known as the "Cooke MS.," whose date is placed at 1490. The details are here much more full than those contained in the Halliwell MS. The passage referring to the legend is as follows:

"And after that was a worthy kynge in Englonde, that was callyd Athelstone, and his youngest son lovyd well the sciens of Gemetry, and he wyst well that hand craft had the practyke of the sciens of Gemetry so well as masons; wherefore he drew him to consell and lernyd [the] practyke of that sciens to his speculatyf. For of speculatyfe he was a master, and he lovyd well masonry and masons. And he bicom a mason hymselfe. And he gaf hem [gave them] charges and names as it is now usyd in Englonde and in other countries. And he ordeyned that they schulde have resonabull pay. And purchesed [obtained] a fre patent of the kyng that they schulde make a sembylly when thei sawe resonably tyme a [to] cum togedir to her [their] counsell of the whiche charges, manors & semble as is write and taught in the boke of our charges wherefor I leve hit at this tyme."

Thus much is contained in the MS. from lines 611 to 642. Subsequently, in lines 688-719, which appear to have been taken from what is above called the "Boke of Charges," the legend is repeated in these words:

"In this manner was the forsayde art begunne in the lond of Egypt bi the forsayd maister Euglat [Euclid], & so hit went fro lond to lond and fro kyngdome to kyngdome. After that, many yeris, in the tyme of Kyng Adhelstone, wiche was sum tyme kynge of Englonde, bi his counsell and other gret lordys of the lond bi comyn [common] assent for grete default y-fende [found] among masons thei ordeyned a certayne reule amongys hem [them]. On [one] tyme of the yere or in iii yere, as nede were to the kyng and gret lordys of the lond and all the comente [community], fro provynce to provynce and fro cowntre to cowntre congregacions scholde be made by maisters, of all maisters masons and felaws in the forsayd art. And so at such congregacions they that be made masters scholde be examined of the articles after written, & be ransacked [thoroughly examined] whether thei be abull and kunnyng [able and skilful] to the profyete of the lordys hem to serve [to serve them], and to the honor of the forsayd art."

Seventy years later, in 1560, the Landsdowne MS. was written, and in it we find the legend still further developed, and Prince Edwin for the first time introduced by name. That manuscript reads thus:

"Soone after the Decease of St. Albones, there came Diverse Warrs into Englonde out of Diverse Nations, so that the good rule of Masons was dishired [disturbed] and put down until the tyme of King Adilston. In his tyme there was a worthy King in Englonde, that brought this Land into good rest, and he builded many great workes and buildings, therefore he loved well Masons, for he had a sone called Edwin, the which Loved Masons much more than his Father did, and he was soe practized in Geometry, that he delighted much to come and talke with Masons and to learne of them the Craft. And after, for the love he had to Masons and to the Craft, he was made Mason at Windsor, and he gott of the King, his Father, a Charter and commission once every yere to have Assembly, within the Realme where they would within Englonde, and to correct within themselves Faults & Tresspasses that were done as touching the Craft, and he held them an Assembly, and there he made Masons and gave them Charges, and taught them the Manners and Comands the same to be kept ever afterwards. And tooke them the Charter and commission to keep their Assembly, and Ordeined that it should be renewed from King to King, and when the Assembly were gathered together he made a Cry, that all old Masons or young, that had any Writeings or Vnderstanding of the Charges and manners that were made before their Lands, where-soever they were made Masons, that they should shew them forth, there were found some in French, some in Greek, some in Hebrew, and some in English, and some in other Languages, and when they were read and over seen well the intent of them was vnderstood to be all one, and then he caused a Book to be made thereof how this worthy Craft of Masonrie was first founded, and he himselfe comanded, and also then caused, that it should be read at any tyme when it should happen any Mason or Masons to be made to give him or them their Charges, and from that, until this Day, Manners of Masons have been kept in this Manner and forme, as well as Men might Gouverne it, and Furthermore at diverse Assemblies have been put and Ordained diverse Charges by the best advice of Masters and Fellows."

All the subsequent manuscripts contain the legend substantially as it is in the Landsdowne; and most of them appear to be mere copies of it, or, most probably, of some original one of which both they and it are copies.

In 1723 Dr. Anderson published the first edition of the Book of Constitutions, in which the history of the fraternity of Freemasons is, he says, "collected from their general records and their faithful traditions of many ages." He gives the legend taken, as he says, from "a certain record of Freemasons written in the reign of King Edward IV.," which manuscript, Preston asserts, "is said to have been in the possession of the famous Elias Ashmole." As the old manuscripts were generally inaccessible to the Fraternity, (and, indeed, until recently but few of them had been discovered,) it is to the publication of the legend by Anderson, and subsequently by Preston, that we are to attribute its general adoption by the Craft for more than a century and a half. The form of the legend, as given by Anderson in his first edition, varies slightly from that in his second. In the former, he places the date of the occurrence at 930; in his second, at 926: in the former, he styles the congregation at York a General Lodge; in his second, a Grand Lodge. Now, as the modern and universally accepted form of the legend agrees in both respects with the latter statement, and not with the former, it must be concluded that the second edition, and the subsequent ones by Entick and Noorthouck, who only repeat Anderson, furnished the form of the legend as now popular.

In the second edition of the Constitutions, (p. 63,) published in 1738, Anderson gives the legend in the following words:

"In all the Old Constitutions it is written to this purpose, viz.:

"That though the antient records of the Brotherhood in England were most of them destroyed or lost in the war with the Danes, who burnt the Monasteries where the Records were kept; yet King Athelstan, (the Grandson of King Alfred,) the first anointed King of England, who translated the Holy Bible into the Saxon language, when he had brought the land into rest and peace, built many great works, and encouraged many Masons from France and elsewhere, whom he appointed overseers thereof: they brought with them the Charges and Regulations of the foreign Lodges, and prevail'd with the King to increase the wages.

"That Prince Edwin, the King's Brother, being taught Geometry and Masonry, for the love he had to the said Craft, and to the honorable principles whereon it is grounded, purchased a Free Charter of King Athelstan his Brother, for the Free Masons having among themselves a Connection, or a power and freedom to regulate themselves, to amend what might happen amiss, and to hold an yearly Communication in a General Assembly.

"That accordingly Prince Edwin summon'd all the Free and Accepted Masons in the Realm, to meet him in the Congregation at York, who came and form'd the Grand Lodge under him as their Grand Master, A. D. 926.

"That they brought with them many old Writings and Records of the Craft, some in Greek, some in Latin, some in French, and other languages; and from the contents thereof, they framed the CONSTITUTIONS of the English Lodges, and made a Law for themselves, to preserve and observe the same in all Time coming, etc., etc., etc."

Preston accepted the legend, and gave it in his second edition (p. 198) in the following words:

"Edward died in 924, and was succeeded by Athelstane his son, who appointed his brother Edwin patron of the Masons. This prince procured a Charter from Athelstane, empowering them to meet annually in communication at York. In this city, the first Grand Lodge of England was formed in 926, at which Edwin presided as Grand Master. Here many old writings were produced in Greek, Latin, and other languages, from which it is said the Constitutions of the English Lodge have been extracted."

Such is the "York legend," as it has been accepted by the Craft, contained in all the old manuscripts from at least the end of the fourteenth century to the present day; officially sanctioned by Anderson, the historiographer of the Grand Lodge in 1723, and repeated by Preston, by Oliver, and by almost all succeeding Masonic writers. Only recently has any one thought of doubting its authenticity; and now the important question in Masonic literature is whether it is a myth or a history — whether it is all or in any part fiction or truth — and if so, what portion belongs to the former and what to the latter category. In coming to a conclusion on this subject, the question necessarily divides itself into three forms.

1. Was there an Assembly of Masons held in or about the year 926, at York, under the patronage or by the permission of King Athelstan?

There is nothing in the personal character or the political conduct of Athelstan that forbids such a possibility or even probability. He was liberal in his ideas, like his grandfather the great Alfred; he was a promoter of civilization; he patronized learning, built many churches and monasteries, encouraged the translation of the Scriptures, and gave charters to many operative companies. In his reign, the "frith-gildan," free gilds or sodalities, were incorporated by law. There is, therefore, nothing improbable in supposing that he extended his protection to the Operative Masons. The uninterrupted existence for several centuries of a tradition that such an Assembly was held, requires that those who deny it should furnish some more satisfactory reason for their opinion than has yet been produced. "Incredulity," says Voltaire, "is the foundation of history." But it must be confessed that, while an excess of credulity often mistakes fable for reality, an obstinacy of incredulity as frequently leads to the rejection of truth as fiction. The Rev. Mr. Woodford, in an essay on The Connection of York with the History of Freemasonry in England, inserted in Hughan's Unpublished Records of the Craft, has critically discussed this subject, and comes to this conclusion. "I see no reason, therefore, to reject so old a tradition, that under Athelstan the Operative Masons obtained his patronage, and met in General Assembly." To that verdict I subscribe.

2. Was Edwin, the brother of Athelstan, the person who convoked that Assembly? This question has already been discussed in the article Edwin, where the suggestion is made that the Edwin alluded to in the legend was not the son or brother of Athelstan, but Edwin, king of Northumbria. Francis Drake, in his speech before the Grand Lodge of York in 1726, was, I think, the first who publicly advanced this opinion; but he does so in a way that shows that the view must have been generally accepted by his auditors, and not advanced by him as something new. He says: "You know we can boast that the first Grand Lodge ever held in England was held in this city, where Edwin, the first Christian king of Northumbria, about the six hundredth year after Christ, and who laid the foundation of our Cathedral, sat as Grand Master."

Edwin, who was born in 586, ascended the throne in 617; and died in 633. He was pre-eminent, among the Anglo-Saxon kings who were his contemporaries, for military genius and statesmanship. So inflexible was his administration of justice, that it was said that in his reign a woman or child might carry everywhere a purse of gold without danger of robbery,—high commendation in those days of almost unbridled rapine. The chief event of the reign of Edwin was the introduction of Christianity into the kingdom of Northumbria. Previous to his reign, the northern metropolis of the Church had been placed at York, and the king patronized Paulinus the bishop, giving him a house and other possessions in that city. The only objection to this theory is its date, which is three hundred years before the reign of Athelstan and the supposed meeting at York in 926.

3. Are the Constitutions which were adopted by that General Assembly now extant? It is not to be doubted, that if a General Assembly was held, it must have adopted Constitutions or regulations for the government of the Craft. Such would mainly be the object of the meeting. But there is no sufficient evidence that the Regulations now called the "York Constitutions," or the "Gothic Constitutions," are those that were adopted in 926. It is more probable that the original document and all genuine copies of it are lost, and that it formed the type from which all the more modern manuscript Constitutions have been formed. There is the strongest internal evidence that all the manuscripts, from the Halliwell to the Papworth, had a common original, from which they were copied with more or less accuracy, or on which they were framed with more or less modification. And this original I suppose to be the Constitutions which must have been adopted at the General Assembly at York.

The theory, then, which I think may safely be advanced on this subject, and which must be maintained until there are better reasons than we now have to reject it, is, that about the year 926 a General Assembly of Masons was held at York, under the patronage of Edwin, brother of Athelstan, at which Assembly a code of laws was adopted, which became the basis on which all subsequent Masonic Constitutions were framed.

York Manuscripts. Originally there were six manuscripts of the Old Constitutions bearing this title, because they were deposited in the Archives of the now extinct Grand Lodge of all England, whose seat was at the city of York. But the MS. No. 3 is now missing, although it is mentioned in the inventory made at York in 1779. Nos. 2, 4, and 5 are now in possession of the York Lodge. Recently Bro. Hughan discovered Nos. 2 and 6 in the Archives of the Grand Lodge of England, at London. The dates of these manuscripts, which do not correspond with the number of their titles, are as follows:

No. 1	has the date of	1600.
" 2	"	" 1704.
" 3	"	" 1630.
" 4	"	" 1693.
" 5	"	" 1670.
" 6	"	" 1680.

Of these manuscripts, No. 1 was published by Bro. Hughan in his Old Charges of British Freemasons, and Nos. 2 and 4, by the same author, in his History of Freemasonry in York. The other manuscripts are as yet unpublished. Bro. Hughan deems No. 4 of some importance because it contains the following sentence: "The one of the elders takeing the Booke, and that hee or shee that is to be made mason shall lay their hands thereon, and the charge shall bee given." This, he thinks, affords some presumption that women were admitted as members of the old Masonic gilds, although he admits that we possess no other evidence confirmatory of this theory. The truth is, that the sentence was a translation of the same clause written in other old Constitutions in Latin. In the York MS. No. 1, the sentence is thus: "Tunc unus ex senioribus teneat librum et ille vel illi," etc., i. e., "he or they." The writer of No. 4 copied, most probably, from No. 1, and his translation of "hee or shee" from "ille vel illi," instead of "he or they," was either the result of ignorance in mistaking illi, they, for illa, she, or of carelessness in writing shee for they. It is evident that the charges thus to be sworn to, and which immediately follow, were of such a nature as made most of them physically impossible for women to perform; nor are females alluded to in any other of the manuscripts. All Masons there are "Fellows," and are so to be addressed.

There are two other York Manuscripts of the Operative Masons, which have been published in the Fabric Rolls of York Minster, an invaluable work, edited by the Rev. James Raine, and issued under the patronage and at the expense of the Surtees Society.

York Rite. This is the oldest of all the Rites, and consisted originally of only three degrees: 1. Entered Apprentice; 2. Fellow Craft; 3. Master Mason. The last included a part which contained the True Word, but which was disrupted from it by Dunckerley in the latter part of the last century, and has never been restored. The Rite in its purity does not now exist anywhere. The nearest approach to it is the St. John's Masonry of Scotland, but the Master's degree of the Grand Lodge of Scotland is not the Master's degree of the York Rite. When Dunckerley dismembered the third degree, he destroyed the identity of the Rite. In 1813, it was apparently recognized by the United Grand Lodge of England, when it defined "pure Ancient Masonry to consist of three degrees, and no more: viz., those of the Entered Apprentice, the Fellow Craft, and the Master Mason, including the Supreme Order of the Holy Royal Arch." Had the Grand Lodge abolished the Royal Arch degree, which was then practised as an independent Order in England, and reincorporated its secrets in the degree of Master Mason, the York Rite would have been revived. But by recognizing the Royal Arch as a separate degree, and retaining the Master's degree in its mutilated form, they repudiated the Rite. In the United States it has been the almost universal usage to call the Masonry there practised the York Rite. But it has no better claim to this designation than it has to be called the Ancient and Accepted Rite, or the French Rite, or the Rite of Schröder. It has no pretensions to the York Rite. Of its first three degrees, the Master's is the mutilated one which took the Masonry of England out of the York Rite, and it has added to these three degrees six others which were never known to the Ancient York Rite, or that which was practised in England, in the earlier half of the eighteenth century, by the legitimate Grand Lodge. In all my writings for years past, I have ventured to distinguish the Masonry practised in the United States, consisting of nine degrees, as the "American Rite," a title to which it is clearly and justly entitled, as the system is peculiar to America, and is practised in no other country.

Bro. Hughan, speaking of the York Rite, (Unpubl. Rec., p. 148,) says "there is no such Rite, and what it was no one now knows." I think that this declaration is too sweeping in its language. He is correct in saying that there is at this time no such Rite. I have just described its decadence; but he is wrong in asserting that we are now ignorant of its character. In using the title, there is no reference to the Grand Lodge of all England, which met for some years during the last century, but rather to the York legend, and to the hypothesis that York was the cradle of English Masonry. The York Rite was that Rite which was most probably organized or modified at the revival in 1717, and practised for fifty years by the Constitutional Grand Lodge of England. It consisted of only the three symbolic degrees, the last one, or the Master's, containing within itself the secrets now transferred to the Royal Arch. This Rite was carried in its purity to France in 1725, and into America at a later period. About the middle of the eighteenth century the continental Masons, and about the end of it the Americans, began to superimpose upon it those high degrees which, with the necessary mutilation of the third, have given rise to numerous other Rites. But the Ancient York Rite, though no longer cultivated, must remain on the records of history as the oldest and purest of all the Rites.

Z.

Zabud. A historical personage at the court of King Solomon, whose name appears in several of the high degrees. In that of Select Master in the American Rite, it has been corrupted into Izabud. He is mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 5, where he is described in the authorized version as being "principal officer and the king's friend." The original is Zabud ben Nathan cohen regneh hahmelek, which is literally "Zabud, son of Nathan, a priest, the friend of the king." Adam Clarke says he was "the king's chief favorite, his confidant." Smith (Dict. Bib.) says: "This position, if it were an official one, was evidently distinct from that of counsellor, occupied by Ahithophel under David, and had more of the character of private friendship about it." Kitto (Cyclopæd. Bib. Lit.) says of Zabud and of his brother Azariah, that their advancement in the household of King Solomon "may doubtless be ascribed not only to the young king's respect for the venerable prophet (their father), who had been his instructor, but to the friendship he had contracted with his sons during the course of education. The office, or rather honor, of 'friend of the king,' we find in all the despotic governments of the East. It gives high power, without the public responsibility which the holding of a regular office in the state necessarily imposes. It implies the possession of the utmost confidence of, and familiar intercourse with, the monarch, to whose person 'the friend' at all times has access, and whose influence is therefore often far greater, even in matters of state, than that of the recognized ministers of government."

This has been fully carried out in the legend of the Select Master's degree.

Zabulon. The Greek form of Zebulun, the tenth son of Jacob. Delaunay (Thuilleur, p. 79,) says that some ritualists suppose that it is the true form of the word of which Jabulum is a corruption. This is incorrect. Jabulum is a corrupt form of Giblim. Zabulon has no connection with the high degrees, except that in the Royal Arch he represents one of the stones in the Pectoral.

Zadok. A personage in some of the Ineffable degrees of the Scottish Rite. In Scripture he is recorded as having been one of the two chief priests in the time of David, Abiathar being the other. He subsequently, by order of David, anointed Solomon to be king, by whom he was rewarded with the post of high priest. Josephus (Ant. x. 8, § 6,) says that "Sadoc, the high priest, was the first high priest of the Temple which Solomon built." Yet it has been supposed by some authors, in consequence of his name not being mentioned in the detailed account of the dedication, that he had died before the completion of the Temple.

Zarathustra. The name, in the Zend language, of that great reformer in religion more commonly known to Europeans as Zoroaster, which see.

Zarthan. The Zarthan of 2 Chronicles iv. 17 appears to be the same place as the Zeredatha of 1 Kings vii. 46. In the Masonic ritual, the latter word is always used. See Zeredatha.

Zeal. Ever since the revival in 1717, (for it is found in the earliest lectures,) it was taught that Apprentices served their Masters with "freedom, fervency, and zeal;" and the symbols of the first two of these virtues were chalk and charcoal. In the oldest rituals, earthen pan (which see) was designated as the symbol of zeal; but this was changed by Preston to clay, and so it still remains. See Fervency and Freedom.

The instruction to the Operative Mason to serve his Master with freedom, fervency, and zeal—to work for his interests willingly, ardently, and zealously—is easily understood. In its application to Speculative Masonry, for the Master of the Work we substitute the Grand Architect of the Universe, and then our zeal, like our freedom and our fervency, is directed to a higher end. The zeal of a Speculative Mason is shown by advancing the morality, and by promoting the happiness of his fellow-creatures.

Zedekiah. A personage in some of the high degrees, whose melancholy fate is described in the Second Book of Kings and in the prophecies of Jeremiah. He was the twentieth and last king of Judah. When Nebuchadnezzar had in his second siege of Jerusalem deposed Jehoiachin, whom he carried as a captive to Babylon, he placed Zedekiah on the throne in his stead. By this act Zedekiah became tributary to the king of the Chaldees, who exacted from him a solemn oath of fidelity and obedience. This oath he observed no longer than till an opportunity occurred of violating it. In the language of the author of the Books of Chronicles, "he rebelled against King Nebuchadnezzar, who had made him swear by God."

This course soon brought down upon him the vengeance of the offended monarch, who invaded the land of Judah with an immense army. Remaining himself at Riblah, a town on the northern border of Palestine, he sent the army under his general, Nebuzaradan, to Jerusalem, which was invested by the Babylonian forces. After a siege of about one year, during which the inhabitants endured many hardships, the city was taken by an assault, the Chaldeans entering it through breaches in the northern wall.

It is very natural to suppose, that when the enemy were most pressing in their attack upon the devoted city; when the breach which was to give them entrance had been effected; and when, perhaps, the streets most distant from the Temple were already filled with Chaldean soldiery, a council of his princes and nobles should have been held by Zedekiah in the Temple, to which they had fled for refuge, and that he should ask their advice as to the most feasible method of escape from the impending danger. History, it is true, gives no account of any such assembly; but the written record of these important events which is now extant is very brief, and, as there is every reason to admit the probability of the occurrence, there does not appear to be any historical objection to the introduction of Zedekiah into the legend of the Super Excellent Master's degree, as having been present and holding a council at the time of the siege. By the advice of this council, Zedekiah attempted to make his escape across the Jordan. But he and his attendants were, says Jeremiah, pursued by the Chaldean army, and overtaken in the plains of Jericho, and carried before Nebuchadnezzar. His sons and his nobles were slain, and, his eyes being put out, he was bound in chains and carried captive to Babylon, where at a later period he died.

Zelator. The first degree of the German Rose Croix. The title expresses the spirit of emulation which should characterize the neophyte.

Zendavesta. The scriptures of the Zoroastrian religion containing the doctrines of Zoroaster. Avesta means the sacred text, and Zend the commentary. The work as we now have it is supposed to have been collected by learned priests of the Sassanian period, who translated it into the Pehlevi, or vernacular language of Persia. The greater part of the work was lost during the persecutions by the Mohammedan conquerors of Persia. One only of the books has been preserved, the Vendidad, comprising twenty-two chapters. The Yasna and the Vispered together constitute the collection of fragments which are termed Vendidad Sadé. There is another fragmentary collection called Yesht Sadé. And these constitute all that remain of the original text. So that, however comprehensive the Zendavesta must have been in its original form, the work as it now exists makes but a comparatively small book.

The ancients, to whom it was familiar, as well as the modern Parsees, attribute its authorship to Zoroaster. But Dr. Haug, rightly conceiving that it was not in the power of any one man to have composed so vast a work as it must have been in its original extent, supposes that it was the joint production of the original Zarathustra Sitama and his successors, the high priests of the religion, who assumed the same name.

The Zendavesta is the scripture of the modern Parsee; and hence for the Parsee Mason, of whom there are not a few, it constitutes the Book of the Law, or Trestle-Board. Unfortunately, however, to the Parsee it is a sealed book, for, being written in the old Zend language, which is now extinct, its contents cannot be understood. But the Parsees recognize the Zendavesta as of Divine authority, and say in the catechism, or compendium of doctrines in use among them: "We consider these books as heavenly books, because God sent the tidings of these books to us through the holy prophet Zurthost."

Zenith. That point in the heavens which is vertical to the spectator, and from which a perpendicular line passing through him and extended would reach the centre of the earth. All the old documents of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite are dated "under the Celestial Canopy of the Zenith which answers to —;" the latitude of the place whence the document is issued being then given. The latitude alone is expressed because it indicates the place of the sun's meridian height. The longitude is always omitted, because every place whence such a document is issued is called the Grand East, the one spot where the sun rises. The theory implied is, that although the south of the Lodge may vary, its chief point must always be in the east, the point of sunrise, where longitude begins.

Zennaar. The sacred cord used in the Hindustanee initiation, and which writers on ritualism have compared to the Masonic apron. Between eight and fifteen years of age, every Hindu boy is imperatively required to receive the investiture of the zennaar. The investiture is accompanied by many solemn ceremonies of prayer and sacrifice. After the investiture, the boy is said to have received his second birth, and from that time a Hindu is called by a name which signifies 'twice born.'

Coleman (Mythology of the Hindus, p. 155,) thus describes the zennaar:

"The sacred thread must be made by a Brahman. It consists of three strings, each ninety-six hands (forty-eight yards), which are twisted together: it is then folded into three, and again twisted; these are a second time folded into the same number, and tied at each end in knots. It is worn over the left shoulder (next the skin, extending half-way down the right thigh) by the Brahmans, Ketries, and Vaisya castes. The first are usually invested with it at eight years of age, the second at eleven, and the Vaisya at twelve. The period may, from especial causes, be deferred; but it is indispensable that it should be received, or the parties omitting it become outcasts."

Zerbal. The name of King Solomon's Captain of the Guards, in the degree of Intimate Secretary. No such person is mentioned in Scripture, and it is therefore an invention of the ritualist who fabricated the degree. If derived from Hebrew, its roots will be found in זר, zer, an enemy, and בל, bal, and it would signify "an enemy of Baal."

Zeredatha. The name of the place between which and Succoth are the clay grounds where Hiram Abif is said to have cast the brazen utensils for the use of the Temple. See Clay Ground.

Zerubbabel. In writing the life of Zerubbabel in a Masonic point of view, it is incumbent that reference should be made to the legends as well as to the more strictly historical details of his eventful career. With the traditions of the Royal Arch, and some other of the high degrees, Zerubbabel is not less intimately connected than is Solomon with those of Symbolic or Ancient Craft Masonry. To understand those traditions properly, they must be placed in their appropriate place in the life of him who plays so important a part in them. Some of these legends have the concurrent support of Scripture, some are related by Josephus, and some appear to have no historical foundation. Without, therefore, vouching for their authenticity, they must be recounted, to make the Masonic life of the builder of the second Temple complete.

Zerubbabel, who, in the book of Ezra, is called "Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah," was the grandson of that King Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, who had been deposed by Nebuchadnezzar and carried as a captive to Babylon. In him, therefore, was vested the regal authority, and on him, as such, the command of the returning captives was bestowed by Cyrus, who on that occasion, according to a Masonic tradition, presented to him the sword which Nebuchadnezzar had received from his grandfather, Jehoiachin.

As soon as the decree of the Persian monarch had been promulgated to his Jewish subjects, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the priests and Levites, assembled at Babylon, and prepared to return to Jerusalem, for the purpose of rebuilding the Temple. Some few from the other tribes, whose love of their country and its ancient worship had not been obliterated by the luxuries of the Babylonian court, united with the followers of Zerubbabel, and accompanied him to Jerusalem. The greater number, however, remained; and even of the priests, who were divided into twenty-four courses, only four courses returned, who, however, divided themselves, each class into six, so as again to make up the old number. Cyrus also restored to the Jews the greater part of the sacred vessels of the Temple which had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, and five thousand and four hundred were received by Zerubbabel, the remainder being brought back, many years after, by Ezra. Only forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty Israelites, exclusive of servants and slaves, accompanied Zerubbabel, out of whom he selected seven thousand of the most valiant, whom he placed as an advanced guard at the head of the people. Their progress homewards was not altogether unattended with danger; for tradition informs us that at the river Euphrates they were opposed by the Assyrians, who, incited by the temptation of the vast amount of golden vessels which they were carrying, drew up in hostile array, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Jews, and the edict of Cyrus, disputed their passage. Zerubbabel, however, repulsed the enemy with such ardor as to ensure a signal victory, most of the Assyrians having been slain in the battle, or drowned in their attempt to cross the river in their retreat. The rest of the journey was uninterrupted, and, after a march of four months, Zerubbabel arrived at Jerusalem, with his weary followers, at seven o'clock in the morning of the 22d of June, five hundred and thirty-five years before Christ.

During their captivity, the Jews had continued, without intermission, to practise the rights of Freemasonry, and had established at various places regular Lodges in Chaldea. Especially, according to the Rabbinical traditions, had they instituted their mystic fraternity at Naharda, on the Euphrates; and, according to the same authority, we are informed that Zerubbabel carried with him to Jerusalem all the secret knowledge which was the property of that Institution, and established a similar fraternity in Judea. This coincides with, and gives additional strength to, the traditions of the Royal Arch degree.

As soon as the pious pilgrims had arrived at Jerusalem, and taken a needful rest of seven days, a tabernacle for the temporary purposes of divine worship was erected near the ruins of the ancient Temple, and a Council was called, in which Zerubbabel presided as King, Jeshua as High Priest, and Haggai as Scribe, or principal officer of State. It was there determined to commence the building of the second Temple upon the same holy spot which had been occupied by the first, and the people liberally contributed sixty-one thousand drachms of gold, and five thousand minas of silver, or nearly a quarter of a million of dollars, towards defraying the expenses; a sum which sinks into utter insignificance, when compared with the immense amount appropriated by David and Solomon to the construction of their Temple.

The site having been thus determined upon, it was found necessary to begin by removing the rubbish of the old Temple, which still encumbered the earth, and prevented the workmen from making the necessary arrangements for laying the foundation. It was during this operation that an important discovery was made by three sojourners, who had not originally accompanied Zerubbabel, but who, sojourning some time longer at Babylon, followed their countrymen at a later period, and had arrived at Jerusalem just in time to assist in the removal of the rubbish. These three sojourners, whose fortune it was to discover that stone of foundation, so intimately connected with the history of Freemasonry, and to which we have before had repeated occasion to allude, are supposed by a Masonic tradition to have been Esdras, Zachariah, and Nehemiah, the three holy men, who, for refusing to worship the golden image, had been thrown by Nebuchadnezzar into a fiery furnace, from which they emerged uninjured. In the Chaldee language, they were known by the names of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. It was in penetrating into some of the subterranean vaults, that the Masonic stone of foundation, with other important mysteries connected with it, were discovered by the three fortunate sojourners, and presented by them to Zerubbabel and his companions Jeshua and Haggai, whose traditional knowledge of Masonry, which they had received in a direct line from the builders of the first Temple, enabled them at once to appreciate the great importance of these treasures.

As soon as that wonderful discovery was made, on which depends not only the existence of the Royal Arch degree, but the most important mystery of Freemasonry, the Jews proceeded on a certain day, before the rising of the sun, to lay the foundation-stone of the second Temple; and for that purpose, we are told, Zerubbabel selected that stone of foundation which had been discovered by the three sojourners. On this occasion, we learn that the young rejoiced with shouts and acclamations, but that the ancient people disturbed them with their groans and lamentations, when they reflected on the superb magnificence of the first Temple, and compared it with the expected inferiority of the present structure. As in the building of the first Temple, so in this, the Tyrians and Sidonians were engaged to furnish the timber from the forests of Lebanon, and to conduct it in the same manner on floats by sea to Joppa.

Scarcely had the workmen well commenced their labors, when they were interrupted by the Samaritans, who made application to be permitted to unite with them in the construction of the Temple. But the Jews, who looked upon them as idolaters, refused to accept of their services. The Samaritans in consequence became their bitter enemies, and so prevailed, by misrepresentations, with the ministers of Cyrus, as to cause them to put such obstructions in the way of the construction of the edifice as seriously to impede its progress for several years. With such difficulty and danger were the works conducted during this period, that the workmen were compelled to labor with the trowel in one hand and the sword in the other. To commemorate these worthy craftsmen, who were thus ready, either to fight or to labor in the cause of God, as circumstances might require, the sword and trowel crosswise, or, as the heralds would say, en saltire, have been placed upon the Royal Arch Tracing-Board or Carpet of our English brethren. In the American ritual this expressive symbol of valor and piety has been unfortunately omitted.

In the seventh year after the restoration of the Jews, Cyrus, their friend and benefactor died, and his son Cambyses, in Scripture called Ahasuerus, ascended the throne. The Samaritans and the other enemies of the Jews, now becoming bolder in their designs, succeeded in obtaining from Cambyses a peremptory order for the stoppage of all the works at Jerusalem, and the Temple consequently remained in an unfinished state until the second year of the reign of Darius, the successor of Cambyses.

Darius appears to have had, like Cyrus, a great friendship for the Israelites, and especially for Zerubbabel, with whom he was well acquainted in his youth. We are informed, as an evidence of this, that, when a private man, he made a vow, that if he should ever ascend the throne, he would restore all the vessels of the Temple that had been retained by Cyrus. Zerubbabel, being well aware of the friendly disposition of the king, determined, immediately after his accession to power, to make a personal application to him for his assistance and protection in rebuilding the Temple. Accordingly he departed from Jerusalem, and after a journey full of peril, in which he was continually attacked by parties of his enemies, he was arrested as a spy by the Persian guards in the vicinity of Babylon, and carried in chains before Darius, who however immediately recognized him as the friend and companion of his youth, and ordering him instantly to be released from his bonds, invited him to be present at a magnificent feast which he was about to give to the Court. It is said that on this occasion, Zerubbabel, having explained to Darius the occasion of his visit, implored the interposition of his authority for the protection of the Israelites engaged in the restoration of the Temple. The king promised to grant all his requests, provided he would reveal to him the secrets of Freemasonry. But this the faithful prince at once refused to do. He declined the favor of the monarch at the price of his infamy, and expressed his willingness rather to meet death or exile, than to violate his sacred obligations as a Mason. This firmness and fidelity only raised his character still higher in the estimation of Darius, who seems, indeed, to have been endowed with many noble qualities both of heart and mind.

It was on this occasion, at the feast given by King Darius, that, agreeably to the custom of Eastern monarchs, he proposed to his courtiers the question whether the power of wine, women, or the king, was the strongest. Answers were made by different persons, assigning to each of these the precedence in power; but when Zerubbabel was called on to assert his opinion, he declared that though the power of wine and of the king might be great, that of women was still greater, but that above all things truth bore the victory. Josephus says that the sentiments of Zerubbabel having been deemed to contain the most wisdom, the king commanded him to ask something over and above what he had promised as the prize of the victor in the philosophic discussion. Zerubbabel then called upon the monarch to fulfil the vow that he had made in his youth, to rebuild the Temple, and restore the vessels that had been taken away by Nebuchadnezzar. The king forthwith granted his request, promised him the most ample protection in the future prosecution of the works, and sent him home to Jerusalem laden with honors, and under the conduct of an escort.

Henceforth, although from time to time annoyed by their adversaries, the builders met with no serious obstruction, and finally, twenty years after its commencement, in the sixth year of the reign of Darius, and on the third day of the month Adar, 515 years B. C., the Temple was completed, the cope-stone celebrated, and the house solemnly dedicated to Jehovah with the greatest joy.

After this we hear nothing further of Zerubbabel, nor is the time or manner of his death either recorded in Scripture or preserved by Masonic tradition. We have, however, reason for believing that he lived to a good old age, since we find no successor of him mentioned until Artaxerxes appointed Ezra as the Governor of Judea, fifty-seven years after the completion of the Temple.

Zinnendorf, Johann Wilhelm

von. Few men made more noise in German Masonry, or had warmer friends or more bitter enemies, than Johann Wilhelm Ellenberger, who, in consequence of his adoption by his mother's brother, took subsequently the title of Von Zinnendorf, by which he is universally known. He was born at Halle, August 10, 1731. He was initiated into Masonry at the place of his birth. He afterwards removed to Berlin, where he received the appointment of General Staff Surgeon, and chief of the medical corps of the army. There he joined the Lodge of the Three Globes, and became an ardent disciple of the Rite of Strict Observance, in which he took the Order name of Eques à lapide nigro. He was elected Master of the Scottish Lodge. He had the absolute control of the funds of the Order, but refusing to render any account of the disposition which he had made of them, an investigation was commenced. Upon this, Zinnendorf withdrew from the Rite, and sentence of excommunication was immediately afterwards pronounced against him.

Zinnendorf in return declared the Strict Observance an imposture, and denounced its theory of the Templar origin of Masonry as false.

In the meantime, he sent his friend Hans Carl Baumann to Stockholm, that he might receive manuscripts of the degrees of the Swedish system which had been promised him by Carl Friederich von Eckleff, Scottish Grand Master of the Chapter in that city. Baumann returned with the manuscripts, which, however, it appears from a subsequent declaration made by the Duke of Sudermania, were very imperfect.

But, imperfect as they were, out of them Zinnendorf constructed a new Rite in opposition to the Strict Observance. Possessed of great talent and energy, and, his enemies said, of but little scrupulousness as to means, he succeeded in attracting to him many friends and followers. In 1766, he established at Potsdam the Lodge "Minerval," and in 1767, at Berlin, the Lodge of the "Three Golden Keys." Masons were found to give him countenance and assistance in other places, so that in June 24, 1770, twelve Lodges of his system were enabled to unite in the formation of a body which they called the Grand Lodge of all the Freemasons of Germany.

The success of this body, under the adverse circumstances by which it was surrounded, can only be attributed to the ability and energy of its founder, as well as to the freedom with which he made use of every means for its advancement without any reference to their want of firmness. Having induced the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt to accept the Grand Mastership, he succeeded, through his influence, in obtaining the recognition and alliance of the Grand Lodge of England in 1773; but that body seven years after withdrew from the connection. In 1774, Zinnendorf secured the protectorship of the king of Prussia for his Grand Lodge. Thus patronized, the Grand Lodge of Germany rapidly extended its influence and increased in growth, so that in 1778 it had thirty-four Lodges under its immediate jurisdiction, and provincial Lodges were established in Austria, Silesia, Pomerania, Lower Saxony, and Russia. Findel explains this great accession of strength by supposing that it could only have been the consequence of the ardent desire of the German Masons to obtain the promised revelations of the high degrees of the system of Zinnendorf.

In 1774, Zinnendorf had been elected Grand Master, which office he held until his death.

But he had his difficulties to encounter. In the Lodge "Royal York," at Berlin, he found an active and powerful antagonist. The Duke of Sudermania, Grand Master of Sweden, in an official document issued in 1777, declared that the Warrant which had been granted by Eckleff to Zinnendorf, and on the strength of which he had founded his Grand Lodge, was spurious and unauthorized; the Grand Lodge of Sweden pronounced him to be a fomenter of disturbances and an insolent calumniator of the Swedish Grand Master, and in 1780 the Grand Lodge of England withdrew from its alliance.

But Zinnendorf was undismayed. Having quit the service of the government in 1779, he made a journey to Sweden in an unsuccessful effort to secure all the documents connected with the Swedish system. Returning hence, he continued to preside over the Grand Lodge with unabated zeal and undiminished vigor until his death, which took place June 6, 1782.

Von Zinnendorf undoubtedly committed many errors, but we cannot withhold from him the praise of having earnestly sought to introduce into German Masonry a better system than the one which was prevailing in the last quarter of the eighteenth century.

Zinnendorf, Rite of. The Rite invented by Count Von Zinnendorf, and fabricated out of imperfect copies of the Swedish system, with additions from the Illuminism of Avignon and the reveries of Swedenborg. It consisted of seven degrees, divided into three sections as follows:

I. Blue Masonry.

1. Apprentice.
2. Fellow Craft.
3. Master.

II. Red Masonry.

4. Scottish Apprentice and Fellow Craft.
5. Scottish Master.

III. Capitular Masonry.

6. Favorite of St. John.
7. Chapter of the Elect.

It was practised by the Grand Lodge of Germany, which had been established by Zinnendorf, and by the Lodges of its obedience.

Zion. Mount Zion was the south-western of the three hills which constituted the high table-land on which Jerusalem was built. It was the royal residence, and hence it is often called "the city of David." The name is sometimes used as synonymous with Jerusalem.

Zizon. This is said, in one of the Ineffable degrees of the Scottish Rite, to be the name of the balustrade before the Sanctum Sanctorum. There is no such word in Hebrew, but it may be a corruption of the Talmudic זיזא, ziza, which Buxtorf (Lex. Talm.) defines as "a beam, a little beam, a small rafter."

Zodiac, Masonic. (Zodiaque Maçonnique.) A series of twelve degrees, named after the twelve signs of the Zodiac, the first being the Ram. It was in the series of the Metropolitan Chapter of France, and in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

Zoroaster. More correctly, Zarathustra. He was the legislator and prophet of the ancient Bactrians, out of whose doctrines the modern religion of the Parsees has been developed. As to the age in which Zoroaster flourished, there have been the greatest discrepancies among the ancient authorities. The earliest of the Greek writers who mentions his name is Xanthus of Lydia, and he places his era at about 600 years before the Trojan war, which would be about 1800 years before Christ. Aristotle and Eudoxus say that he lived 6000 years before Plato; while Berosus, the Babylonian historian, makes him a king of Babylon, and the founder of a dynasty which reigned over Babylon between 2200 and 2000 B. C. The Parsees are more moderate in their calculations, and say that their prophet was a contemporary of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, and accordingly place his era at 550 B. C. Haug, however, in his Essays on the Sacred Language, etc., of the Parsees, declares that this supposition is utterly groundless. He thinks that we can, under no circumstances, assign him a later date than 1000 B. C., and is not even disinclined to place his era much earlier, and make him a contemporary of Moses.

Bro. Albert Pike, who has devoted much labor to the investigation of this confused subject of the Zoroastrian era, says, in an able article in Mackey's National Freemason, (vol. iii., No. 3:)

"In the year 1903 before Alexander, or 2234 B. C., a Zarathustrian king of Media conquered Babylon. The religion even then had degenerated into Magism, and was of unknown age. The unfortunate theory that Vitagpa, one of the most efficient allies of Zarathustra, was the father of Darius Hystaspes, has long ago been set at rest. In the Chaldean lists of Berosus, as found in the Armenian edition of Eusebius, the name Zoroaster appears as that of the Median conqueror of Babylon; but he can only have received this title from being a follower of Zarathustra and professing his religion. He was preceded by a series of eighty-four Median kings; and the real Zarathustra lived in Bactria long before the tide of emigration had flowed thence into Media. Aristotle and Eudoxus, according to Pliny, place Zarathustra 6000 years before the death of Plato; Hermippus, 5000 years before the Trojan war. Plato died 348 B. C.; so that the two dates substantially agree, making the date of Zarathustra's reign 6300 or 6350 B. C.; and I have no doubt that this is not far from the truth."

Bunsen, however, (God in History, vol. i., b. iii., ch. vi., p. 276,) speaks of Zarathustra Spitama as living under the reign of Vistaspas towards the year 3000 B. C., certainly not later than towards 2500 B. C. He calls him "one of the mightiest intellects and one of the greatest men of all time;" and he says of him: "Accounted by his contemporaries a blasphemer, atheist, and firebrand worthy of death; regarded even by his own adherents, after some centuries, as the founder of magic, by others as a sorcerer and deceiver, he was, nevertheless, recognized already by Hippocrates as a great spiritual hero, and esteemed the earliest sage of a primeval epoch — reaching back to 5000 years before their date — by Eudoxus, Plato, and Aristotle."

The name of this great reformer is always spelled in the Zendavesta as Zarathustra, with which is often coupled Spitama; this, Haug says, was the family name, while the former was his surname, and hence both he and Bunsen designate him as Zarathustra Spitama. The Greeks corrupted Zarathustra into Zarathrades and Zoroastres, and the Romans into Zoroaster, by which name he has always, until recently, been known to Europeans. His home was in Bactria, an ancient country of Asia between the Oxus River on the north and the Caucasian range of mountains on the south, and in the immediate vicinity, therefore, of the primal seat of the Aryan race, one of whose first emigrations, indeed, was into Bactria.

The religion of Zoroaster finds its origin in a social, political, and religious schism of the Bactrian Iranians from the primitive Aryans. These latter led a nomadic and pastoral life in their native home, and continued the same habits after their emigration. But a portion of these tribes, whom Haug calls "the proper Iranians," becoming weary of these wanderings, after they had reached the highlands of Bactria abandoned the pastoral and wandering life of their ancestors, and directed their attention to agriculture. This political secession was soon followed by wars, principally of a predatory kind, waged, for the purpose of booty, by the nomadic Aryans on the agricultural settlements of the Iranians, whose rich fields were tempting objects to the spoiler.

The political estrangement was speedily and naturally followed by a religious one. It was at this time that Zoroaster appeared, and, denouncing the nature-worship of the old Aryan faith, established his spiritual religion, in which, says Bunsen, "the antagonisms of light and darkness, of sunshine and storm, become transformed into antagonisms of good and evil, of powers exerting a beneficent or corrupting influence on the mind."

The doctrine of pure Zoroastrianism was monotheistic. The Supreme Being was called Ahuramazda, and Haug says that Zoroaster's conception of him was perfectly identical with the Jewish notice of Jehovah. He is called "the Creator of the earthly and spiritual life, the Lord of the whole universe, at whose hands are all the creatures." He is wisdom and intellect; the light itself, and the source of light; the rewarder of the virtuous and the punisher of the wicked.

The dualistic doctrine of Ormuzd and Ahrimanes, which has falsely been attributed to Zoroaster, was in reality the development of a later corruption of the Zoroasteric teaching. But the great reformer sought to solve the puzzling question of the origin of evil in the world, by supposing that there existed in Ahuramazda two spirits, inherent in his nature, the one positive and the other negative. All that was good was real, existent; while the absence of that reality was a non-existence or evil. Evil was the absence of good as darkness was the absence of light.

Zoroaster taught the idea of a future life and the immortality of the soul. The doctrine of the resurrection is one of the principal dogmas of the Zendavesta. He also clearly inculcated the belief of a heaven and a hell. The former called the house of hymns, because the angels were supposed to sing hymns there; the latter the house of destruction, and to it were relentlessly consigned the poets and priests of the old Aryan religion.

The doctrine of sacred names, so familiar to the Hebrews, was also taught by Zoroaster. In one of the Yashts, a portion of the Zendavesta, Ahuramazda tells Zara-thustra that the utterance of one of his sacred names, of which he enumerates twenty, is the best protection from evil. Of these names, one is ahmi, "I am," and another, ahmi yat ahmi, "I am who I am." The reader will be reminded here of the holy name in Exodus, Ehyeh asher Ehyeh, or "I am that I am."

The doctrine of Zoroaster was not forever confined to Bactria, but passed over into other countries; nor in the transmission did it fail to suffer some corruption. From its original seat it spread into Media, and under the name of Magism, or the doctrine of the Magavas, i. e., the mighty ones, was incorporated at Babylon with the Chaldean philosophy, whence we find its traces in the Rabbinitism and the Kabbalism of the Hebrews. It was carried, too, into Persia, where it has been developed into the modern and still existing sect of the Parsees, of whom we now find two divisions, the conservatives and liberals; the former cultivating the whole modified doctrine of Zoroaster, and the latter retaining much of the doctrine, but rejecting to a very great extent the ceremonial ritual.

Zurthost. The name given by the modern Parsees to Zarathustra or Zoroaster. They call him their prophet, and their religious sect the Zarthosti community.

ADDENDUM
TO ORIGINAL WORK,

CONTAINING NUMEROUS OMITTED SUBJECTS AND THE RESULTS OF LATER RESEARCH AND DISCOVERY TO THE PRESENT TIME.

BY
C. T. McCLENACHAN.

PREFACE TO ADDENDUM.

IT would be superfluous to enlarge upon the original very excellent Preface by Dr. Albert G. Mackey, in which he sets forth most lucidly his objects and the fulness of his purpose in compiling the "Encyclopædia of Freemasonry and its Kindred Sciences," were it not that advancing time and continued investigation have disclosed additional information in return for the deep and persistent researches of eminent and indefatigable seekers after more light in Masonry, —otherwise an Addendum to his valuable work would be entirely gratuitous.

As the young student or older devotee looks for, and is entitled to receive, the latest Masonic information and deductions derived from research in a work of this class, I have with diffidence undertaken to carry on the work of the Doctor from the standpoint where he ceased his labors ten years ago; not by withdrawing a word from, or interpolating, the original, but by means of a voluminous Addendum replacing the few pages of Supplement that concluded the original work, and which consisted of material incidentally omitted in its relative position. This addition, therefore, is a more complete compilation of subsequent discoveries and opinions.

I have been induced to undertake this pleasing task because such action is fraternally invited toward the close of the Doctor's Preface, and who also says, "I do not present this work as perfect, for I well know that the culminating point of perfection can never be attained by human effort. But under many adverse circumstances, I have sought to make it as perfect as I could. Encyclopædias are, for the most part, the result of the conjoined labor of many writers." Neither do I assume perfection in the Addendum, but hope to advance an additional step toward completion.

Who more appropriately should carry out this invitation and effort of the esteemed Doctor than one who knew him intimately and revered him for nearly a generation, and who it is not improbable would have been selected by him, had the choice been given the original author and compiler to continue a work which is "the result of the conjoined labor of many writers."

This Addendum, therefore, is offered as a loving tribute to an esteemed author, who had no peer in his successful endeavors to add so materially to the general information of the Craft.

C. T. McCLENACHAN.

Memoir.

ALBERT GALLATIN MACKEY.

*"Great Giver, grant me Thy last gift and best,
The gift of rest."*

NO more active life, in the cause of the welfare of his fellow-man, can be referred to with greater pride than that of ALBERT GALLATIN MACKEY, who was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 12th of March, 1807. Having passed four years beyond the threescore and ten, ever studying the best interests of humanity, the period for rest became welcome,—and thus, at "Old Point Comfort," on the 20th of June, 1881, the eminent scholar and Mason yielded to the inevitable in nature.

He was the youngest son of Dr. John Mackey, also a native of South Carolina, born in Lancaster district, and a lineal descendant of the celebrated Highland chieftain, Rob Roy Macgregor. At an early age, Albert the son became dependent upon his own energy. After receiving an excellent English education and an elementary course in the classical languages,—which he subsequently and assiduously privately pursued,—he became a tutor, receiving, at the age of seventeen, the appointment of teacher of the public school on John's Island, in the neighborhood of Charleston. While thus employed, he devoted himself so sedulously to the study of medicine that he was admitted to the South Carolina medical college at Charleston, and was graduated March, 1832, receiving his diploma as a doctor of medicine. His thesis in Latin obtained the first prize—an equivalent to the first honor in other colleges. For some years he practised his profession in the vicinity of Charleston, which city, in 1836, was visited by the Asiatic cholera. Dr. Mackey, residing about fifty miles from the city, hastened to the scene of the plague, taking charge of a plantation on one of the neighboring islands where the cholera was raging among the negroes. Without assistance, for several weeks he skilfully treated the disease, and finally checked its progress. He then returned to the city, which became his permanent residence, and where, December 28, 1836, he married Miss Sarah Pamela Hubbell. In 1838 he was elected demonstrator of anatomy in the South Carolina medical college—the college in which he was graduated six years before—and was also appointed physician of the city almshouse.

Although Dr. Mackey was devoted to his profession, his strong literary taste, and especially his fondness for linguistic and archæological pursuits, led him, about 1842, to relinquish the practice of medicine and to devote himself entirely to literature. Subsequently he was connected with many literary and political journals, such as the Southern Quarterly Review, Literary Bulletin, Southern Patriot, Charleston Evening News, Total Abstinence Banner, Charleston Sun, and Morning Transcript, of some of which he was the principal and of others the associate editor. He also contributed largely to literary magazines, and his fugitive pieces are scattered over the pages of Southern periodical literature. As a lecturer on literary subjects, Dr. Mackey was eminently successful whenever he entered the lyceum, and his lectures on the “Temperaments,” “The Middle Ages,” “The True Condition of Woman,” “The Poetry of Talismans,” and on other subjects, were received with much favor wherever delivered.

It is in Masonry, however, that Dr. Mackey attained his greatest celebrity, for to that and its kindred sciences he devoted the best years of his life. He was initiated, passed, and raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason in 1841, in St. Andrew's Lodge, No. 10, at Charleston, S. C.; immediately afterwards he affiliated with Solomon's Lodge, No. 1, of the same city, and in December, 1842, was elected Master thereof. In the following year, December, 1843, he was elected Grand Secretary, and in March, 1845, Grand Lecturer of the Grand Lodge of South Carolina. In both offices he was continued uninterruptedly until 1866, combining with the duties of the Secretariat that of preparing the Reports on Foreign Correspondence. In the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of South Carolina, Dr. Mackey was elected Grand Lecturer in 1845, Deputy Grand High Priest in 1847, and in each successive year, until 1854, when he was made Grand High Priest, in which position he served, by continuous re-elections, until 1867. Upon the organization, in 1860, in South Carolina of a Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters, he was elected Grand Master. During the period he filled these important positions in the Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter, and Grand Council of South Carolina, he exercised a potential and beneficial influence over the Masonry of that State, which grew under his fostering care from a condition of weakness to one of great prosperity. His Annual Reports on Foreign Correspondence, and his instructive lectures and addresses, gave him a reputation which was shared by the Bodies he represented. In 1859, the Royal Arch Masons of the United States, at their triennial convocation in Chicago, elected him to the highest position within their gift, that of General Grand High Priest—an office which he held for six years. At an early period Dr. Mackey took an interest in Scottish Rite Masonry, the abstruse philosophy of which he found congenial. In 1844, he received the Thirty-third or ultimate degree of that rite, became a member of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, and was immediately elected its Secretary-General, which he continuously occupied until his death. For many years he was the oldest member of the Rite in the United States, in virtue of which he held the position of Dean of the Council, and, as a mark of respect and esteem, that Supreme Body, by special enactment, made the office of Secretary-General, which is usually the sixth in rank, the third office during his life.

As a contributor to the literature and science of Freemasonry, Dr. Mackey's labors have been more extensive than those of any other in this country or in Europe. Rob Morris, than whom no one has had better opportunities of judging, said in 1856, in his Reminiscences, that "the character of Dr. Mackey as a profound and lucid historian and writer in all departments of Masonry is, we conceive, unequalled by any living writer, unless it be the venerable Dr. Oliver of England."

In 1845, Dr. Mackey published his first Masonic work, entitled A Lexicon of Freemasonry, which he from time to time revised, corrected, and enlarged, until it finally contained twice as much matter as the first edition. Of this book about eighteen editions have been published in this country, and four in England. In 1851 he published his second work, entitled The Mystic Tie. Then followed The Ahiman Rezon of South Carolina, in 1852; Principles of Masonic Law, in 1856; Book of the Chapter, in 1858; Text-Book of Masonic Jurisprudence, in 1859; History of Freemasonry in South Carolina, in 1861; Manual of the Lodge, in 1862; Cryptic Masonry, in 1867; Symbolism of Freemasonry and Masonic Ritual, in 1869; Encyclopædia of Freemasonry, in 1874; and Masonic Parliamentary Law, in 1875.

Dr. Mackey also contributed largely to the Masonic periodical press of the country. In 1849 he established and edited the Southern and Western Masonic Miscellany, which he discontinued after the close of the fifth year. In 1857 he undertook the publication of a Masonic review, the first number of which made its appearance in July, under the title of The American Quarterly Review of Freemasonry; but, after an existence of two years, the publication was discontinued, it being evident, as asserted in the valedictory, that a Masonic magazine of so high a standard was in advance of the Masonic age.

Upon the suspension of the Quarterly Review of Freemasonry, Dr. Mackey was invited to assume editorial charge of a department of the American Freemason, which he accepted in July, 1859; but his connection with that magazine continued for a year only.

In 1865 he was solicited to take charge of a department in the Masonic Trowel, to which he consented, his first article appearing in the September number of 1865, and for the successive numbers he continued to write for nearly three years.

In October, 1871, Dr. Mackey again began the publication of a Masonic magazine of his own, Mackey's National Freemason. Although a periodical of great merit, it, like his Quarterly Review, was too profound in its disquisitions to suit the general reader, and consequently after three years it was discontinued. Immediately thereafter, Dr.

Mackey's services were secured for the Voice of Masonry, of which he became one of the editors in January, 1875, and for over four years was a constant contributor to the columns of that periodical.

Dr. Mackey was ever too much of a litterateur to become a politician by profession, yet the force of circumstances for a time drew him within its lines. During the late War of the Rebellion, in opposition to the dominant sentiment of the people of his own State (South Carolina) and the opinions of his most influential and nearest friends, he maintained an undisguised allegiance to the Federal Union, and continued through the whole contest zealously loyal to the National government. He embraced every opportunity to afford relief to the Federal prisoners whom the fortunes of war brought within his reach, and many still remember with gratitude the services he then rendered them. In recognition of his well-known devotion to the cause of the Union, he was appointed, in July, 1865, by the President of the United States, Collector of Customs at the port of Charleston. In 1868, in accordance with the reconstruction acts of Congress, a convention of the people of South Carolina was called to form a constitution. To this convention he was chosen a delegate from the county of Charleston, and upon its organization was unanimously elected president. At the first session of the Legislature, held in pursuance of the new constitution, he was within one vote of being elected to the Senate of the United States. He subsequently withdrew from politics, and at the invitation of the Supreme Council of Scottish Rite Masons for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, removed, in 1870, to the city of Washington, D. C., where he continued to reside until, advised by his physician, he went to Old Point Comfort, Virginia, and there died in June, 1881.

In the eulogy over Dr. Mackey, delivered by Past Grand Master Henry Buist, of Georgia, before the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction, he said of the Doctor:

"He was a fearless and gifted speaker; his language was courteous and manner dignified; and occasionally, in his earnestness to maintain what he conceived to be the right, he became animated and eloquent. Positive in his convictions, he was bold in their advocacy. His course of action once determined on, supported by an approving conscience, no fear or disfavor or discomfiture could swerve him from his fixed purpose.

"Whatever was the emergency, he was always equal to it.

"Where others doubted, he was confident; where others faltered, he was immovable; where others queried, he affirmed.

"He was faithful to every public and Masonic duty. Treachery found no place in his character. He never betrayed a trust.

"He was eminently sincere and loyal to his friends, and those who were most intimately associated with him learned to appreciate him the most.

"He was generous and frank in his impulses, and cherished malice toward none, and charity for all.

"His monument is in the hearts of those who knew him longest and best.

"He is no longer of this earth. His work among men is ended; his earthly record is complete."

A

A. (ℳ, Aleph.) In the Accadian, Greek, Etruscan, Pelasgian, Gallic, Samaritan, and Egyptian or Coptic, of nearly the same formation as the English letter. It originally meant with or together, but at present signifies one. In most languages it is the initial letter of the alphabet; not so, however, in the Ethiopian, where it is the thirteenth. The sacred Aleph has the numerical value of one, and is composed of two Yods, one on either side of an inclined Vau. It is said to typify the Trinity in Unity. The Canaanite signification is Bull, symbol of generation. The Divine name in Hebrew connected with this letter is אלהים, A H I H.

Aaron's Band. A degree instituted in 1824, in New York city, mainly for social purposes, and conferred in an independent body. Its ceremonies were not dissimilar to those of High Priesthood, which caused the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State to take umbrage, and the small gathering dispersed.

Abaciscus. The diminutive of Abacus, and, in architecture, refers to the squares of the tessellated pavement or checkered flooring of the ground floor of the Solomonian Temple.

Abazar. The title given to the Master of Ceremonies in the Sixth Degree of the Modern French Rite.

Abchal. The father of Hiram, the King of Tyre.

Abdiel. (Heb., Servant of God.) The name of an angel mentioned by the Jewish Kabbalists. He is represented in Milton's Paradise Lost, Book V., as one of the seraphim, who, when Satan tried to stir up a revolt among the angels subordinate to his authority, alone and boldly withstood his traitorous designs:

Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, untainted,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal.

The name Abdiel became the synonym of honor and faithfulness.

A.

ADAM

Abditorium. A secret place for the deposit of records—a Tabularium.

Abercorn, Earl of. James Hamilton, Lord Paisley, named Grand Master of England by the retiring G. Master, the Duke of Richmond, in 1725. He was at that time the Master of a Lodge, and assisted in instituting the existing Lodge of Benevolence.

Abib. The original name of the Hebrew month Nisan, nearly corresponding to the month of March, the first of the ecclesiastical year. Abib is frequently mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures, and signifies green ears of corn or fresh fruits.

Abibala. The first Assassin in the Elu of the Modern French Rite. Derived from the Hebrew words Abi and balah, father of destruction.

Acacia. Acacia vera, or Nilotica, in Africa, called babul tree in India, and its gum babul, which is similar to gum-arabic. The bark of Acacia Arabica is a powerful tonic in India.

Académie des Illumines d'Avignon. A Hermetic system of philosophy, created in 1785.

Adam. The Entered Apprentice degree symbolizes the creation of man and his first perception of light. In the Elohist form of the Creation we read, "Elohim said, 'Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness, and let him have dominion over the fishes of the sea, over the fowls of the air, over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every reptile that creeps upon the earth!'" And Elohim created man in his image; in the image of Elohim he created him; male and female he created them. . . . And Yahveh Elohim formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed in his nostrils the breath of life, and man was made a living being." Without giving more than a passing reference to the speculative origin and production of man and to his spontaneous generation—Principe Generateur—as set forth by the Egyptians, when we are told that “the fertilizing mud left by the Nile, and exposed to the vivifying action of heat induced by the sun’s rays, brought forth germs which spring up as the bodies of men,” accepted cosmogonies only will be hereinafter mentioned; thus in that of Peru, the first man, created by the Divine Omnipotence, is called Alpa Camasca, “Animated earth.” The Mandans, one of the North American tribes, relate that the Great Spirit moulded two figures of clay, which he dried and animated with the breath of his mouth, one receiving the name of First Man, and the other that of Companion. Taeroa, the god of Tahiti, formed man of the red earth, say the inhabitants; and so we might continue. But as François Lenormant remarks in the Beginnings of History, let us confine ourselves to the cosmogony offered by the sacred traditions of the great civilized nations of antiquity. “The Chaldeans call Adam the man whom the earth produced. And he lay without movement, without life, and without breath, just like an image of the heavenly Adam, until his soul had been given him by the latter.” The cosmogonic account peculiar to Babylon, as given by Berossus, says: “Belos, seeing that the earth was uninhabited, though fertile, cut off his own head, and the other gods, after kneading with earth the blood that flowed from it, formed men, who therefore are endowed with intelligence, and share in the divine thought,” etc. The term employed to designate “man” in his connection with his Creator, is admu, the Assyrian counterpart of the Hebrew Adam. (G. Smith, Chaldean Account of Genesis.) Lenormant further says, that the fragments of Berossus give Adoros as the name of the first patriarch, and Adiuru has been discovered on the cuneiform inscriptions.

Zoroaster makes the creation of man the voluntary act of a personal god, distinct from primordial matter, and his theory stands alone among the learned religions of the ancient world.

According to Jewish tradition in the Targumim and the Talmud, as also to Moses Maimonides, Adam was created man and woman at the same time, having two faces, turned in two opposite directions, and that during a stupor the Creator separated Havvah, his feminine half, from him, in order to make of her a distinct person. Thus were separated the primordial androgyn.

With Shemites and Mohammedans Adam was symbolized in the Lingam, whilst with the Jews Seth was their Adam or Lingam, and successively Noah took the place of Seth, and so followed Abraham and Moses. The worship of Adam as the God-like idea, succeeded by Seth, Noah, Abraham, and Moses, through the symbolism of pillars, monoliths, obelisks, or Matsebas (images), gave rise to other symbolic images, as where Noah was adored under the emblems of a man, ark, and serpent, signifying heat, fire, or passion.

Upon the death of Adam, says traditional history, the pious Gregory declared that the “dead body should be kept above ground, till a fullness of time should come to commit it to the middle of the earth by a priest of the most high God.” This traditional prophecy was fulfilled, it is said, by the body of Adam having been preserved in a chest until about 1800 B. C., when “Melchizedek buried the body in Salem (formerly the name of Jerusalem), which might very well be the middle of the habitable world.”

The Sethites used to say their prayers daily in the Ark before the body of Adam. J. G. R. Forlong, in his Rivers of Life, tells us that “It appears from both the Sabid Aben Batric and the Arabic Catena, that there existed the following ‘short litany,’ said to have been conceived by Noah.” Then follows the prayer of Noah, which was used for so long a period by the Jewish Freemasons at the opening of the Lodge:

“O Lord, excellent art thou in thy truth, and there is nothing great in comparison of thee. Look upon us with the eye of mercy and compassion. Deliver us from this deluge of waters, and set our feet in a large room. By the sorrows of Adam, the first made man; by the blood of Abel, thy holy one; by the righteousness of Seth, in whom thou art well pleased; number us not amongst those who have transgressed thy statutes, but take us into thy merciful care, for thou art our Deliverer, and thine is the praise for all the works of thy hand for evermore. And the sons of Noah said, Amen, Lord.”

The Master of the Lodge would omit the reference to the deluge and add the following to the prayer: “But grant, we beseech thee, that the ruler of this lodge may be endowed with knowledge and wisdom to instruct us and explain his secret mysteries, as our holy brother Moses did (in his lodge) to Aaron, to Eleazar, and to Ithamar (the sons of Aaron), and the several elders of Israel.”

Adam Kadmon. In the Kabbalistic doctrine, the name given to the first emanation from the Eternal Fountain. It signifies the first man, or the first production of divine energy, or the son of God, and to it the other and inferior emanations are subordinate.

Affiliate, Free. The French gave the name of "free affiliates" to those members of a lodge who are exempted from the payment of dues, and neither hold office nor vote. Known among Americans as "honorary members."

Africa. In the French Rite of Adoption, the south of the lodge is called Africa.

African Brotherhood. The Purrah is a strong brotherhood in the country back of the Sierra Leone. The ceremonies are sealed to the uninitiated, and are discovered to be in progress by the howls and dancing lights. Profane intrusion would be death. The object or purpose of the brotherhood is not known. Two other associations exist, known as the Samo and the Bundo, but their ceremonies and definite object have not been promulgated.

Africa, South. A movement commenced in 1881 has proved to be au fait accompli in the constitution of a District Grand Lodge, English Constitution, for Natal, Free State, Griqualand West, and Transvaal in South Africa. There are few towns where Masonry flourishes as healthfully as it does in Cape Town. Masonic buildings in that section compare well with some of the handsome structures in other countries. The Grand Lodge has instituted a Masonic Board of Education, which is in its fourth year, and out of a treasury of $2000 spent $1000 for education.

Agathopades. A liberal ecclesiastical order founded in Brussels in the sixteenth century. Revived and revised by Schayes in 1846. It had for its sacred sign the pentastigma ∴.

Agenda. The order of business, or order of the day. The prospective business to be brought before an association, and frequently used in the higher degrees of Masonry, thus the "Agenda Paper." Also a book of precepts.

Ahab. Son and successor of Omri, King of Israel from 918 to 897 B.C. He married Jezebel, through whose influence the Phœnician worship of Baal was introduced, the king turning to idolatry, and the priests and prophets of Jehovah being cruelly persecuted. He was slain by an arrow in the third war against Syria.

Alaska. Freemasonry was introduced into the Territory of Alaska by Bro. James Biles, Grand Master of Washington Territory, who granted, on April 14, 1868, a dispensation for the establishment of Alaska Lodge, at Sitka. A Warrant of Constitution was granted by the Grand Lodge of Washington, September 17, 1869.

Allah. (Assyrian (Fig. 1), ilu; Aramaic, אֱלֹהִים, elah; Hebrew, אֱלֹהִים, elohim.) The Arabic name of God, derived from (Fig. 2) ilāh, god, and the article (Fig. 3) al, expressing the God by way of eminence. In the great profession of the Unity, on which is founded the religion of Islam, both terms are used, as, pronounced "Lā ilāha ill' Allāh," there is no god but God, the real meaning of the expression being, "There is only one God." Mohammed relates that in his night journey from Mecca to Jerusalem, on ascending through the seven heavens, he beheld above the throne of God this formula; and the green standard of the Prophet was adorned with the mystic sentence. It is the first phrase lisped by the infant, and the devout Moslem utters the profession of the faith at all times, in joy, in sorrow, in praise, in prayer, in battle, and with his departing breath the words are wafted to heaven; for among the peculiar virtues of these words is that they may be spoken without any motion of the lips. The mourners on their way to the grave continue the strain in melancholy tones. Around the supreme name is clustered the masbaha, or rosary, of the ninety-nine beautiful names of God, which are often repeated by the Mohammedan in his devotions. (W. S. Paterson.)

Alliance, Sacred. An organization of twenty-one brethren possessing the ultimate degree of the Scottish Rite, formed in New York, September 19, 1872, who assemble annually on that day. One by one, in the due course of time, this Assembly is to decrease until the sad duty will devolve on some one to banquet alone with twenty draped chairs and covers occupied by the imaginary presence of his fellows. It was instituted to commemorate the breaking of a dead-lock in the close corporation of the Supreme Council by the admission of four very prominent members of the Fraternity.

Alphabet, Number of Letters in. In the Sandwich Island alphabet there are 12 letters; the Burmese, 19; Italian, 20; Bengalese, 21; Hebrew, Syrian, Chaldean, Phœnician, and Samaritan, 22 each; Greek, 24; Latin, 25; German, Dutch, and English, 26 each; Spanish and Slavonic, 27 each; Persian and Coptic, 32 each; Georgian, 35; Armenian, 38; Russian, 41; Muscovite, 43; Sanskrit and Japanese, 50 each; Ethiopic and Tartarian, 202 each.

Al-Sirat. (Ar., the path.) The very narrow bridge extending from this world to the next over the abyss of hell, which must be passed by every one who would enter the Mohammedan paradise. Its width will compare with a hair, the edge of a sword, or the thread of a famished spider. The virtuous cross swiftly and safely, the sinful stumble and fall to the bottomless pit. Koran.

Amal-sagghi. (Great labor.) The name of the 5th step of the mystic ladder of Kadosh, A. A. Scottish Rite.

Amaranth, Order of the. Instituted by Queen Christina of Sweden in 1653, and numbering 31, composed of 15 knights, 15 ladies, and the Queen as the Grandmistress. The insignia consisted of two letters A interlaced, one being inverted, within a laurel crown, and bearing the motto, Dolce nella memoria. The annual festival of this equestrian Order was held at the Epiphany. A society of a similar name, androgynous in its nature, was instituted in 1883, under the supervision of Robert Macoy, of New York, to supplement the Order of the Eastern Star, having a social and charitable purpose, the ritual of which, as well as its constitutional government, has met with much commendation.

Amenti. See Book of the Dead.

Amor Honores Justitia. A motto of the Grand Lodge of England used prior to the union of 1813, and is to be found graven on the "Masonic Token" of 1794, commemorative of the election of the Prince of Wales as M. W. Grand Master, Nov. 24, 1790.

Amru. The name given to the Phœnician carpenter, who is represented in some legends as one of the Assassins. Fanor and Metusael being the other two.

Amshaspands. The name given in the Persian Avesta to the six good genii or powerful angels who continuously wait round the throne of Ormuzd, or Ormazd. Also the name of the six summer months and the six productive working properties of nature.

Anakim. A small race of giants in stature in the south of Palestine who terrified the Hebrew spies upon entering the Land of Promise from Kadesh-Barnea.

Ancient and Primitive Rite. One of the later modifications or outgrowths from the Memphis Rite. According to the constitution, the order dates in France from 1838; in America from 1856; and in England from Oct. 8, 1853. In 1865 the degrees of the order were reduced in number from 95 to 33, and the name of the Sovereign Sanctuary, etc., changed to Supreme Council, as was alleged by Harry Seymour, of New York, then chief of the order, for the more successful competition with the Supreme Council of 33 degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite, from which he had been expelled.

Anima Mundi, Soul of the World. A doctrine of the early philosophers, who conceived that an immaterial force resided in nature and was the source of all physical and sentient life, yet not intelligential.

Anno Egyptiaco. In the Egyptian year. The date used by the Hermetic Fraternity, and found by adding 5044 to the Vulgar Era prior to each 20th July, being the number of years since the consolidation of the Egyptian monarchy under Menes.

Anubis, or Anepu. Egyptian deity, son of Osiris and Nephthys. The Greek Hermes. Having the head of a jackal, with pointed ears and snout, which the Greeks frequently changed to those of a dog. At times represented as wearing a double crown. His duty was to accompany the souls of the deceased to Hades (Amen-thes), and assist Horus in weighing their actions under the inspection of Osiris.

Apex, Rite of. See Sât B'hai, Order of.

Apis. The sacred bull, held in high reverence by the Egyptians as possessing divine powers, specially the gift of prophecy. As it was deemed essential the animal should be peculiarly marked by nature, much difficulty was experienced in procuring it. The bull was required to be black, with a white triangle on its forehead, a white crescent on its side, and a knotted growth, like a scarabæus, under the tongue. Such an animal being found, it was fed for four months in a building facing the East. At new moon it was embarked on a special vessel, prepared with exquisite care, and with solemn ceremony conveyed to Heliopolis, where for forty days it was fed by priests and women. In its sanctified condition it was taken to Memphis and housed in a temple with two chapels and a court wherein to exercise. The omen was good or evil in accordance with which chapel it entered from the court. At the age of 25 years it was led to its death, amid great mourning and lamentations. The bull or apis was an important religious factor in the Isian worship, and was continued as a creature of reverence during the Roman domination of Egypt.

Apron, Washington's. On the next page is a faithful representation of the emblems, wrought in needle-work upon white satin by Madame Lafayette, for a Masonic apron, which the Marquis conveyed from Paris to General Washington at Mount Vernon. It was a cherished memorial, which after Washington's death was formally presented to the "Washington Benevolent Society," at Philadelphia.

Arabici. An Arabian sect of the second century, who believed that the soul died with the body, to be again revived with it at the general resurrection.

Aranyaka. An appendage to the Veda of the Indians supplementary to the Brahmanas, but giving more prominence to the mystical sense of the rites of worship.

Arbroath, Abbey of, England. Erected during the 12th century. Rev. Charles Cordinet, in his description of the ruins of North Britain, has given an account of a seal of the abbey Arbroath marked "Initiation." The seal was ancient before the abbey had an existence, and contains a perfectly distinct characteristic of the Scottish Rite.

Arcade de la Pelleterie. The name of derision given to the Orient of Clermont in France, that is to say, to the Old Grand Lodge, before the union in 1799.

Archæology, Masonic. As well expressed in The (London) Freemason, "We are just at the portals of Masonic history," despite all that has been done and written of late years, not only are we still on the "threshold of inquiry," but we may have to modify many of our views, and not a few of our conclusions. The Guild theory is still warmly supported in England. Primæval religion, especially the "Pyramidal School," and the connection of Masonry with the "Ancient Mysteries," are all again being carefully worked over. Hermeticism is not discarded, and, as our numerous careful students press onward, we may all be compelled to modify essentially many dogmatic declarations and countless hasty assumptions. In all this, Brother Robert Freke Gould, of London, is revealing wonders by the publication of his quarto work on "The History of Freemasonry," the fourth volume of the six being at present in the hands of the publishers. This is the Masonic work of the age.

Archimagus. The chief officer of the Mithraic Mysteries in Persia. He was the representative of Ormuzd, or Ormazd, the type of the good, the true, and the beautiful, who overcame Ahriman, the spirit of evil, of the base, and of darkness.

Architect, Engineer and. An officer in the French Rite, whose duty it is to take charge of the furniture of the Lodge. In the Scottish Rite, such officer in the Consistory has charge of the general arrangement of all preparatory matters for the working or ceremonial of the degrees.

Argonauts, Order of. A German androgynous Masonic society founded in 1775, by brethren of the Rite of Strict Observance. Much of the myth of the Argonauts was introduced into the forms and ceremonies, and many of the symbols taken from this source, such as meeting upon the deck of a vessel, the chief officer being called Grand Admiral, and the nomenclature of parts of the vessel being used. The motto was Est Lebe die Freude, or Joy forever.

Arianism. The doctrine of Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, promulgated in 321 A. D., which was inconsistent with the divinity of Christ. Bishop Alexander insisted that the Son is co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father. Arius opposed this, and asserted that there was a time when the Son was not, as the Father begat the Son, and the latter therefore could not be eternal. The controversy lasted many years, when Alexander called a council of his clergy, which was attended by nearly 100 bishops, and Arius was deposed and excommunicated.

Ariel. In the demonology of the Kabala, the spirit of air; the guardian angel of innocence and purity: hence the Masonic synonym. A name applied to Jerusalem; a water spirit.

Arkansas. Dr. Mackey observes that much obscurity concerns the early history of Masonry in Arkansas. That the disastrous conflagration of November, 1864, which destroyed the Grand Lodge hall, consumed all the records anterior to 1846. Grand Secretary Blocher says that on February 22, 1832, three Lodges—Washington, Western Star, and Morning Star (C. W. Moore asserted there was another)—assembled at Little Rock in convention and organized the Grand Lodge.

Coleman's Masonic Calendar for 1880 says the Grand Lodge was organized November 25, 1838.

The Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons was organized April 28, 1851, by three Chapters, located at Fayetteville, Little Rock, and El Dorado, which had previously received charters from the General Grand Chapter of the United States.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was established in the year 1860.

The Grand Commandery of the Order of the Temple was organized on March 23, 1872.

A Lodge, Council, Chapter, Council of Kadosh, and Consistory of the Scottish Rite are established at Little Rock.

Ark Mariner, Royal, Jewel of. The jewel of this degree prefigures the teachings, which are unique, and draw their symbols from the sea, rain, ark, dove, olive-branch, and Rainbow. This last symbol, as El's sign, "overshadows" the ark, which really is the sign of Ishtar. The ark is said to have contained all the elements of Elohim's creative power, and in "about nine months and three days there came forth the pent-up energies of Maiya;" her symbol is the dove with the mystic olive, which are sacred to her. The whole underlying thought is that of creation.

Armor. In English statutes, armor is used for the whole apparatus of war; offensive and defensive arms. In the Order of the Temple pieces of armor are used to a limited extent. In the chivalric degrees of the Scottish Rite, in order to carry out the symbolism as well as to render effect to its dramas, armor pieces and articles for use of knights become necessary, with mantling, crest, mottoes, etc. Some are herein enumerated:

AILLETTES—Square shields for the shoulders.

ANLACE—Short dagger worn at the girdle.

BALDRIC—Belt diagonally crossing the body.

BATTLE-AXE—Weapon with axe-blade and spear-head.

BEAVER—Front of helmet, which is raised to admit food and drink.

BEAKER—The drinking-cup with mouth-lip.

BELT—For body. Badge of knightly rank.

BRASSART—Armor to protect the arm from elbow to shoulder.

BUCKLER—A long shield for protecting the body.

CORSELET—Breast-plate.

CRE-T—Ornament on helmet designating rank.

CUIRASS—Back-plate.

FASCES—Armor for the thighs, hung from the corselet.

GADLING—Sharp metallic knuckles on gauntlet.

GAUNTLET—Mailed gloves.

GORGET—Armor for the neck.

HALBERD—Long-pole axe.

HAUBERK—Shirt of mail, of rings or scales.

HELMET or CASQUE—Armor for the head.

JAMBEUX—Armor for the legs.

JUPON—Sleeveless jacket, to the hips.

LANCE—Long spear with metallic head and pennon.

MACE—Heavy, short staff of metal, ending with spiked ball.

MANTLE—Outer cloak.

MORION—Head armor without visor.

PENNON—A pennant, or short streamer bifurcated.

PLUME—The designation of knighthood.

SALLET—Light helmet for foot soldiers.

SPEAR—Sword, spur, shield.

VISOR—Front of helmet (slashed), moving on pivots.

Aroba. Pledge, covenant, agreement. (Latin, Arrhabo, a token or pledge. Hebrew, Arab, which is the root of Arubbah, surety, hostage.) This important word, in the Fourteenth Degree of the Scottish Rite, is used when the initiate partakes of the "Ancient Aroba," the pledge, or covenant of friendship, by eating and drinking with his new companions. The word is of greater import than that implied in mere hospitality. The word "aroba" appears nowhere in English works, and seems to have been omitted by Masonic writers. The root "arab" is one of the oldest in the Hebrew language, and means to interweave or to mingle, to exchange, to become surety for any one, and to pledge even the life of one person for another, or the strongest pledge that can be given (Genesis xliii. 9). Judah pleads with Israel to let Benjamin go with him to be presented in Egypt to Joseph, as the latter had requested. He says: "Send the lad with me; I will be surety for him;" and before Joseph he makes the same remark in Gen. xlv. 32. Job, in chap. xvii. 3, appealing to God, says: "Put me in a surety with thee; who is he who will strike hands with me?" (See also 1 Sam. xvii. 18.) In its pure form, the word "arubbah" occurs only once in the Old Testament (Prov. xvii. 18): "A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend." In Latin, Plautus makes use of the following phrase: "Hunc arrhabonem amoris a me accipe."

Artisan, Chief. An officer in the Council of Knights of Constantinople.

Arundel, Thomas Howard, Earl of. Tradition places Arundel as the Grand Master of English Freemasons from 1633 to 1635. This is in accordance with Anderson and Preston.

Aryan. One of the three historical divisions of religion—the other two being the Turanian and the Shemitic. It produced Brahmanism, Buddhism, and the Code of Zoroaster.

Asarota. A variegated pavement used for flooring in temples and ancient edifices.

Ases. The twelve gods and as many goddesses in the Scandinavian mythology.

Asia. In the French Rite of Adoption, the east end of the Lodge is called Asia.

Assyrian Architecture. The discovery in 1882 of the remains of a town, close to, and north of, Nineveh, built by Sargon, about 721 B. C., in size about a mile square, with its angles facing the cardinal points, and the inclosure containing the finest specimens of their architecture, revived much interest in archæologists. The chief place of regard is the royal palace, which was like unto a city of itself, everything being on a colossal scale. The walls of the town were 45 feet thick. The inclined approach to the palace was flanked by strangely formed bulls from 15 to 19 feet high. There were terraces, courts, and passage-ways to an innermost square of 150 feet, surrounded by state apartments and temples. The Hall of Judgment was prominent, as also the astronomical observatory. All entrances to great buildings were ornamented by colossal animals and porcelain decorations and inscriptions.

Astrology. A science demanding the respect of the scholar, notwithstanding its designation as a "black art," and, in a reflective sense, an occult science; a system of divination foretelling results by the relative positions of the planets and other heavenly bodies toward the earth. Men of eminence have adhered to the doctrines of astrology as a science. It is a study well considered in, and forming an important part of, the ceremonies of the "Philosophus," or fourth grade of the First Order of the Society of Rosicrucians. Astrology has been deemed the twin science of astronomy, grasping knowledge from the heavenly bodies, and granting a proper understanding of many of the startling forces in nature. It is claimed that the constellations of the zodiac govern the earthly animals, and that every star has its peculiar nature, property, and function, the seal and character of which it impresses through its rays upon plants, minerals, and animal life. This science was known to the ancients as the "divine art." See Magic.

Atossa. The daughter of King Cyrus of Persia, Queen of Cambyses, and afterward of Darius Hystaspes, of whom she had Xerxes. Referred to in the degree of Prince of Jerusalem, 16th, Scottish Rite.

Atthakatha. An immense commentary of 258 volumes, on the canonical books of Buddhism, and formerly regarded as of equal authority with them. It is ascribed to Badhagosha, about 420 A. D. The Tripitaka and the Atthakatha together are said to contain two million lines.

"Audi, Vide, Tace." (Hear, see, and be silent.) A motto frequently found on Masonic medals, and often appropriately used in Masonic documents.

Auditors. The first class of the secret system adopted by the Christians in their early days. The second class were Catechumens, and the third were The Faithful.

Auffseher. German for warden, or overseer, having the erste or zweite, meaning the first or second overseer.

Auger. An implement used as a symbol in the Ark Mariner's Degree.

Augustus William, Prince of Prussia. Born in 1722, died in 1758. Brother of Frederick the Great, and father of King Frederick William II. A member of Lodge "Drei Weltkugeln," Berlin.

Aurora. (Aurea hora, golden hour; apurus hora, morning hour, the dawn of day.) In Hebrew the light is called Aur, and in its dual capacity Aurim. Hence Urim, lights;—as, Thme, Thummim, perfections. Ea is the sun, the symbolic god of the Egyptians, and Ouro, royalty. Hence we have Aur, Ouro, Ra, which is the double symbolic capacity of "Light." Referring to the Urim and Thummim, Re is physical and intellectual light, while Thme is the divinity of truth and justice.

Aurora is the color of the baldric worn by the brethren in the 16th Degree of the Scottish Rite, which in the legend is said to have been presented by King Darius to the captive Zerubbabel on presentation of his liberty, and that of all his people, who had been slaves in Babylon for seventy years.

Avatar. The descent of a Hindu deity; an incarnation.

Avis of Portugal. See Evora, Brothers of.

Axe. See Knight of the Royal Axe, MACKEY.

Azariah. One of Daniel's three friends, 605 B. C. The King of Judah, 809 B. C.

Azazel. "Scapegoat," the "demon of dry places." Translated by others to be the fallen angel mentioned in the Book of Enoch, and identical with Sammael, the Angel of Death. Symmachus says, "the goat that departs;" Josephus, "the averter of ills," "caper emissarius."

Two he-goats, in all respects alike and equal, were brought forward for the day of atonement. The urn was shaken and two lots cast; one was "For the Name," and the other "For Azazel." A scarlet tongue-shaped piece of wood was twisted on the head of the goat to be sent away, and he was placed before the gate and delivered to his conductor. The high priest, placing his two hands on the goat, made confession for the people, and pronounced THE NAME clearly, which the people hearing, they knelt and worshipped, and fell on their faces and said, "Blessed be the Name. The Honor of His kingdom forever and ever." The goat was then led forth to the mountain-side and rolled down to death.

Azrael. (Heb., help of God.) In the Jewish and the Mohammedan mythology, the name of the angel who watches over the dying and separates the soul from the body. Prior to the intercession of Mohammed, Azrael inflicted the death penalty visibly, by striking down before the eyes of the living those whose time for death was come. See Henry W. Longfellow's exquisite poem, Azrael.

Aztec Writings. The key to the Aztec writings, it is alleged, has been discovered by Rev. Father Damago Soto, of Concordia, Vera Cruz.

Azure. The clear, blue color of the sky. Cerulean. The appropriate color of the symbolic degrees sometimes termed Blue Degrees.

B.

B. (ב, Beth.) A labial consonant standing second in most alphabets, and in the Hebrew or Phœnician signifies house, probably from its form of a tent or house, thus:

and finally the Hebrew ב, having the numerical value two. When united with the leading letter of the alphabet, אב, it signifies Ab, Father, Master, or the one in authority, as applied to Hiram the Architect. This is the root of Baal. (See MACKEY.) Hebrew name of Deity connected with this letter is בַּחֲרִי, Bakhur.

Bacon, Roger. An English monk who made wonderful discoveries in many sciences. He was born in Ilchester in 1214, educated at Oxford and Paris, and entered the Franciscan Order in his twenty-fifth year. He explored the secrets of nature, and made many discoveries, the application of which were looked upon as magic. He denounced the ignorance and immorality of the clergy, resulting in accusations, through revenge, and final imprisonment. He was noted as a Rosicrucian. Died 1292.

Bactylea. The sacred stones worshipped by the Phœnicians and Bactrians, and believed by them to have fallen from heaven. Presumptively, meteoric stones.

Bahrđt, K. F. Born 1741, died 1792. A German teacher, said to have been made a Mason in England, and on his return to Germany established "The German Union," a quasi-Masonic Society of six degrees—"Young Men," "Men," "Elder Men," "Mesopolites," "Diocesans," and "Overseers." The society was short-lived, and its author imprisoned in 1789 for a libel on Wöllner, the minister.

Balder or Baldur. The ancient Scandinavian or older German divinity. The hero of one of the most beautiful and interesting of the myths of the Edda; the second son of Odin and Frigga, and the husband of the maiden Nanna. In brief, the myth recites that Balder dreamed that his life was threatened, which being told to the gods, a council was held by them to secure his safety. The mother proceeded to demand and receive from every inanimate thing, iron and all metals, fire and water, stones, earth, plants, beasts, birds, reptiles, poisons, and diseases, that they would not injure Balder. Balder then became the subject of sport with the gods, who wrestled, cast darts, and in innumerable ways playfully tested his invulnerability. This finally displeased the mischievous, cunning Loki, the Spirit of Evil, who, in the form of an old woman, sought out the mother, Frigga, and ascertained from her that there had been excepted or omitted from the oath the little shrub Mistletoe. In haste Loki carried some of this shrub to the assembly of the gods, and gave to the blind Hoder, the god of war, selected slips, and directing his aim, Balder fell pierced to the heart.

Sorrow among the gods was unutterable, and Frigga inquired who, to win her favor, would journey to Hades and obtain from the goddess Hel the release of Balder. The heroic Helmod or Hermoder, son of Odin, offered to undertake the journey. Hel consented to permit the return if all things animate and inanimate should weep for Balder.

All living beings and all things wept, save the witch or giantess Thock (the step-daughter of Loki), who refused to sympathize in the general mourning. Balder was therefore obliged to linger in the kingdom of Hel until the end of the world.

Band. The neck ribbon bearing the jewel of the office in Lodge, Chapter, or Grand Lodge of various countries, and of the symbolic color pertaining to the body in which it is worn.

Banner Bearer. The name of an officer known in the higher degrees in the French Rite. One who has in trust the banner; similar in station to the Standard Bearer of a Grand Lodge, or of a Supreme Body of the Scottish Rite.

Banneret. A small banner. An officer known in the Order of the Knights Templar, who, with the Marshal, had charge of warlike undertakings. A title of an order known as Knight Banneret, instituted by Edward I. The banneret of the most ancient order of knighthood called Knight Bachelor was shaped like Fig. 1.

(Fig. 3.)

The Knights Banneret, next in age, had a pennon like Fig. 2. That of the Barons like Fig. 3.

Barbati Fratres. Bearded Brothers—at an earlier date known as the Conversi—craftsmen known among the Conventual Builders, admitted to the Abbey Corbey in the year 851, whose social grade was more elevated than the ordinary workmen, and were freeborn. The Conversi were filiates in the Abbeys, used a quasi-monastic dress, could leave their profession whenever they chose and could return to civil life. Converts who abstained from secular pursuits as sinful and professed conversion to the higher life of the Abbeys, without becoming monks. Scholæ or guilds of such operatives lodged within the convents. We are told by Bro. Geo. F. Fort (in his "Critical Inquiry Concerning the Mediæval Conventual Builders, 1884") that the scholæ of dextrous Barbati Fratres incurred the anger of their co-religionists, by their haughty deportment, sumptuous garb, liberty of movement, and refusal to have their long, flowing beards shaven—hence their name—thus tending to the more fascinating attractions of civil life as time carried them forward through the centuries to the middle of the thirteenth, when William Abbott, of Premontré, attempted to enforce the rule of shaving the beard. "These worthy ancestors of our modern craft deliberately refused," and said, "if the execution of this order were pressed against them, 'they would fire every cloister and cathedral in the country.'" The decretal was withdrawn.

Bath Kol. (בַּתְּקוֹל, Daughter Voice, or Daughter of the Voice.) The Jews say that the Holy Spirit spoke to the Israelites in the days of the Tabernacle through the Urim and Thummim, and under the first Temple by the Prophets, and under the second by the Bath Kol, an inferior divine intimation to the oracular voice proceeding from the Mercy-Seat, as a daughter is supposed to be inferior to the mother.

Bar Mitzvah (Son of Commandment). An Israelite who attains the age of thirteen years and one day, and is thenceforth responsible for his own sins: corresponding to the Christian rite of confirmation. A Bar Mitzvah among the Orthodox is bound to observe the three fundamental principles of wearing the Talith, the Phylacteries, and the observance of the Mezuzah.

Basilica. A hall or court-room in which the king administered the laws. Some of these were of vast size, accommodating the Tribunal, which consisted, in addition to the curule chair of the prætor and space required by the suitors and their advocates, of seats for the jury approximating two hundred.

A rectangular building, mentioned in Anderson's Constitution.

Battery. A given number of blows by the gavels of the officers, or by the hands of the Brethren, as a mark of approbation, admiration, or reverence, and at times accompanied by the acclamation.

Benai. See Bonaïm, MACKAY.

Benakar. The name of a cavern to which certain assassins fled for concealment.

Benefit Societies. Societies of recent growth, known among the Masonic organizations of all classes and departments, to render combined aid in case of the death of a member. Organizations of small or no capital, paying the officers an indifferent compensation, but levying an assessment on each member for the benefit of the relatives or others in the event of death of one of their number. These life insurance associations are generally protected by the laws of the State or other Government, are exempt from execution, not liable to be seized by any legal or equitable process to pay any liability of a member. They are based on well defined insurance tables, and where integrity exists success follows.

Benevolent Institutions, U. S. There are five institutions in the U. States of an educational and benevolent character, deriving their existence in whole or in part from Masonic beneficence: 1. Girard College, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; 2. Masonic Widows' and Orphans' Home, Louisville, Kentucky; 3. Oxford Orphan Asylum, Oxford, N. Carolina; 4. St. John's Masonic College, Little Rock, Arkansas; 5. Masonic Female College, Covington, Georgia.

Beside the Stephen Girard Charity Fund, founded over a half century ago in Philadelphia, the capital investment of which is $62,000, the annual interest being devoted "to relieve all Master Masons in good standing," there is a Charity Fund of $60,000 for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Master Masons, and an incorporated Masonic Home, which will now, in very early time, be made effective. The District of Columbia has an organized Masonic charity, entitled St. John's Mite Association. Idaho has an Orphan Fund, to which every Master Mason pays annually one dollar. Indiana has organized the Masonic Widows' and Orphans' Home Society. Maine has done likewise; and Nebraska has an Orphans' School Fund, although no building has been proposed.

Bible. (βιβλος, "Book.") A collective name for the writings constituting the professed rule of faith and practice of the Christian church, and composed of the Old Testament of 39 books, originally written in the Hebrew language, mainly, and the New Testament of 27 books, written in Greek. The Old Testament, to the exclusion of the New, is also the Bible of the Jews, and contains the oldest literature in existence. The New Testament was written within the first century of our era. The number of Christians in the world is about 380,000,000; of Jews, 7,000,000.

Bochim. (בכי'ם, weepings.) A pass-word in the Order of Ishmael. An angel spoke to Hagar as she wept at the well when in the wilderness with her son Ishmael. The angel is looked upon as a spiritual being, possibly the Great Angel of the Covenant, the Michael who appeared to Moses in the burning bush, or the Joshua, the captain of the hosts of Jehovah.

Book of Mormon. This sacred book of the Mormons was first published in 1830 by Joseph Smith, who claimed to have translated it from gold plates which he had found under divine guidance secreted in a stone box. The number of Mormons is estimated at about 150,000 in the United States, and 50,000 in other countries.

Book of the Dead, containing the ancient Egyptian philosophy as to death and the resurrection. A portion of these sacred writings was invariably buried with the dead. The Book in fac-simile has been published by Dr. Lepsius, and translated by Dr. Birch. The myth of the "Judgment of Amenti" forms a part of the "Book of the Dead," and shadows forth the verities and judgments of the unseen world.

The Amenti was the Place of Judgment of the Dead, situated in the West, where Osiris was presumed to be buried. There were forty-two assessors of the amount of sin committed, who sat in judgment, and before whom the adjudged passed in succession.

There seems to be a tie which binds Freemasonry to the noblest of the cults and mysteries of antiquity. The most striking exponent of the doctrines and language of the Egyptian Mysteries of Osiris is this "Book of the Dead," or Ritual of the Underworld, or Egyptian Bible of 165 chapters, the Egyptian title of which was "The Manifestation to Light," or the Book revealing light to the soul. Great dependence was had, as to the immediate attainment of celestial happiness, upon the human knowledge of this wonderful Book, especially of the principal chapters. On a sarcophagus of the 11th dynasty (chronology of Prof. Lepsius, say B. C. 2420) is this inscription: "He who knows this book is one who, in the day of the resurrection of the underworld, arises and enters in; but if he does not know this chapter, he does not enter in so soon as he arises." The conclusion of the first chapter says: "If a man knows this book thoroughly, and has it inscribed upon his sarcophagus, he will be manifested in the day in all the forms that he may desire, and entering into his abode will not be turned back" (Tiele's Hist. Egyptian Rel., 25).

The Egyptian belief was that portions of the Book were written by the finger of Thoth, back in the mist of time, B. C. 3000. The 125th chap. describes the last judgment. The oldest preserved papyrus is of the 18th dynasty (B. C. 1591, Lep.). The most perfect copy of this Book is in the Turin Museum, where it covers one side of the walls, in four pieces, 300 feet in length.

The following extract is from the first chapter:

"Says Thot to Osiris, King of Eternity, I am the great God in the divine boat; I fight for thee; I am one of the divine chiefs who are the TRUE LIVING WORD of Osiris. I am Thot, who makes to be real the word of Horus against his enemies. The word of Osiris against his enemies made truth in Thot, and the order is executed by Thot. I am with Horus on the day of celebrating the festival of Osiris, the good Being, whose Word is truth; I make offerings to Ra (the Sun); I am a simple priest in the underworld, anointing in Abydos, elevating to higher degrees of initiation; I am prophet in Abydos on the day of opening or upheaving the earth. I behold the mysteries of the door of the underworld; I direct the ceremonies of Mendes; I am the assistant in the exercise of their functions; I AM GRAND MASTER OF THE CRAFTSMEN WHO SET UP THE SACRED ARCH FOR A SUPPORT." See Truth.

Book of the Fraternity of Stonemasons. Some years ago, a manuscript was discovered in the archives of the city of Cologne bearing the title of Brüderschaftsbuch der Steinmetzen, with records going back to the year 1396. Steinbrenner (Orig. and Early Hist. of Masonry, p. 104) says: "It fully confirms the conclusions to be derived from the German Constitutions, and those of the English and Scotch Masons, and conclusively proves the inauthenticity of the celebrated Charter of Cologne."

Bosonian, The. The fourth degree of the African Architects.

Boswell, John (of Auchinleck). A Scottish laird of the family of the biographer of Dr. Johnson. His appearance in the Lodge of Edinburgh at a meeting held at Holyrood in June, 1600, affords the earliest authentic instance of a person being a member of the Masonic fraternity who was not an architect or builder by profession. Kenning's Cyclopædia.

Box of Fraternal Assistance. A box of convenient shape and size under the charge of the Hospitaller or Almoner, in the Modern French and A. A. Scottish Rites, wherein is collected the obligatory contributions of the duly assembled brethren at every convocation, which collections can only be used for secret charitable purposes, first among the members, but if not there required, among worthy profane; the Master and the Hospitaller being the only ones cognizant of the name of the beneficiary, together with the brother who suggests an individual in need of the assistance.

Brazen Laver. See Laver.

Brazen Pillars. See Pillars, MACKEY.

Bridge. A most significant symbol in the 15th and 16th Degrees of the Scottish Rite, at which an important event transpires. The characteristic letters which appear on the Bridge, L. O. P., refer to that liberty of thought which is ever thereafter to be the inheritance of those who have been symbolically captive for seven weeks of years. It is the new era of the freedom of expression, the liberation of the former captive thought. Liberty, but not License. See Lukah Deror Pessah; also, Liber.

Brithering. The Scotch term for Masonic initiation.

Brothers of the Bridge. According to Mackenzie, a charitable and religious brotherhood which arose in the south of France in the Middle Ages, the members devoting themselves to building bridges, making roads, erecting hospitals, and otherwise providing for the comfort and protection of travellers and pilgrims. Two bridges are mentioned, that of Bon Pas, three miles from Avignon, 1177-1188, and that over the Rhone, Pont d'Esprit, commenced 1185. Ramsay affirms that this order united with the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and afterwards with the Roman builders, and thus would imply a direct connection between them and Freemasonry. Several of the degrees of the French system take some of their decorations from the Order of the Brothers of the Bridge.

Buchanan MS. Published for the first time in Gould's History of Freemasonry, vol. i. Bro. Gould says, "This parchment roll was presented to the G. Lodge of England by Mr. George Buchanan, Whitby, March 3, 1880, who is of the opinion that it is of the latter part of the seventeenth century—say from 1660 to 1680," and this date seems to meet the approval of the critical Gould. "The scroll was found with the papers of the late Mr. Henry Belcher, an antiquarian; and is presumed to have been among the effects of the former Grand Lodge of All England"—(York).

Buddhism. The religion of the disciples of Buddha. It prevails over a great extent of Asia, and is estimated to be equally popular with any other form of faith among mankind. Its founder, Buddha,—a word which seems to be an appellative, as it signifies the enlightened,—lived about five hundred years before the Christian era, and established his religion as a reformation of Brahmanism.

The moral code of Buddhism is very perfect, surpassing that of any other heathen religion. But its theology is not so free from objection. Max Müller admits that there is not a single passage in the Buddhist canon of scripture which presupposes the belief in a personal God or a Creator, and hence he concludes that the teaching of Buddha was pure atheism. Yet Upham (Hist. and Doct. of Bud., p. 2) thinks that, even if this be capable of proof, it also recognizes "the operation of Faith (called Damata), whereby much of the necessary process of conservation or government is infused into the system."

The doctrine of Nirvana, according to Burnouf, taught that absolute nothing or annihilation was the highest aim of virtue, and hence the belief in immortality was repudiated. Such, too, has been the general opinion of Oriental scholars; but Müller (Science of Religion, p. 141) adduces evidence, from the teachings of Buddha, to show that Nirvana may mean the extinction of many things—of selfishness, desire, and sin—without going so far as the extinction of subjective consciousness.

The sacred scripture of Buddhism is the Tripitaka, literally, the Three Baskets. The first, or the Vinaya, comprises all that relates to morality; the second, or the Sitrās, contains the discourses of Buddha; and the third, or Abhidharma, includes all works on metaphysics and dogmatic philosophy. The first and second Baskets also receive the general name of Dharma, or the Law. The principal seat of Buddhism is the island of Ceylon, but it has extended into China, Japan, and many other countries of Asia. See Aranyaka, Atthakatha, Mahabharata, Pitaka, Puranas, Ramayana, Shaster, Sruti, Tuntra, Upanishad, Upadevas, Veda, and Vedanga.

Bul. The primitive designation of the month Marchesvan. See Zif.

Bull. (Lat., bullosa, that which is round or swelling.) The designation given to the capsule of the seal attached to important documents emanating from an emperor or from a pope; and as thus applied to the seal, it became the designation of the document. The Bull is issued by the apostolic chancellor when promulgated by a pope, and dates from the day of incarnation, in contradistinction to briefs, which are dated from the day of the nativity.

The several important Bulls which have been issued by the popes of Rome intended to affect the fraternity of Freemasons are as follows: the Bull In Eminenti of Clement XII., dated 27th April, 1738. This Bull was confirmed and renewed by that beginning Providas, of Benedict XIV., 17th May, 1751; then followed the edict of Pius VII., in 1821; the apostolic edict Quo Graviora of Leo XII., in 1825; that of Gregory XVI., in 1832; Pius IX. in 1865; and finally that of Leo XIII., who ascended to the papacy in 1878, and issued his Bull, or encyclical letter, "Humanum Genus," in 1884.

Whatever may have been the severity of the Bulls issued by the predecessors of Leo XIII., he with great clearness ratifies and confirms them all in the following language: "Therefore, whatsoever the popes our predecessors have decreed to hinder the designs and attempts of the sect of Freemasons; whatsoever they have ordained to deter or recall persons from societies of this kind, each and all do we ratify and confirm by our Apostolic authority." At the same time acknowledging that this "society of men are most widely spread and firmly established."

This letter of the Roman hierarchy thus commences: "The human race, after its most miserable dejection, through the wiles of the devil, from its Creator, God, the giver of celestial gifts, has divided into two different and opposite factions, of which one fights ever for truth and virtue, the other for their opposites. One is the kingdom of God on earth . . . the other is the kingdom of Satan."

That, "by accepting any that present themselves, no matter of what religion, they (the Masons) gain their purpose of urging that great error of the present day, viz., that questions of religion ought to be left undetermined, and that there should be no distinction made between verities. And this policy aims at the destruction of all religions, specially at that of the Catholic religion, which, since it is the only true one, cannot be reduced to equality with the rest without the greatest injury."

"But, in truth, the sect grants great license to its initiates, allowing them to defend either position, that there is a God, or that there is no God."

Thus might we quote continuous passages, which need only to be stated to proclaim their falsity, and yet there are those who hold to the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope. See Bull, Papal, MACKAY.

Buri, or Bure. The first god of Norse mythology. In accordance with the quaint cosmogony of the ancient religion of Germany or that of Scandinavia, it was believed that before the world came into existence there was a great void, on the north side of which was a cold and dark region, and on the south side one warm and luminous. In Nifheim was a well, or the "seething caldron," out of which flowed twelve streams into the great void and formed a huge giant. In Iceland the first great giant was called Ymir, by the Germans Tuisco, whose three grandchildren were regarded as the founders of three of the German races.

Cotemporary with Ymir, and from the great frost-blocks of primeval chaos, was produced a man called Buri, who was wise, strong, and beautiful. His son married the daughter of another giant, and their issue were the three sons Odin, Wili, and We, who ruled as gods in heaven and earth.

By some it is earnestly believed that upon these myths and legends many symbols of Masonry were founded.

C.

C. The third letter of the English alphabet, but was not known in the Hebrew, Phœnician, or early Aryan languages.

Caaba or Kaaba. (Arabic, Ka'abah, cubic building.) The square building or temple in Mecca. More especially the small cubical oratory within, held in adoration by the Mohammedans, as containing the black stone said to have been given by an angel to Abraham. See Allah.

Louis. Born in Paris, January 23, 1769, and died in same city, November 21, 1821. In early life he was a violent opponent of Masonry, but became one of its chief supporters ere his death. He was the author of Le Tombeau de Jacques de Molay.

The inner as well as the outer structure receive their name from Ka'ab, cube. The above engraving is from a forthcoming work, Splendor of the Shrine, by William S. Paterson, New York.

Cadet-Gassicourt, Charles

III., King of Castile, who conquered and gave the Castle of Calatrava, an important fortress of the Moors of Andalusia, to the Knights Templar, who subsequently relinquished their possession of it to the king. The king, being disappointed in the ability of the Templars to retain it, then offered the defence of the place to Don Raymond of Navarre, Abbot of St. Mary of Hitero, a Cistercian convent, who accepted it. Don Raymond being successful, the king gave the place to him and his companions, and instituted the Order of Calatrava. A Grand Master was appointed and approved of by the Pope, Alexander III., 1164, which was confirmed by Innocent III. in 1198. The knights had been granted the power of electing their own Grand Master; but on the death of Don Garcias Lopez de Pardella, 1489, Ferdinand and Isabella annexed the Grand Mastership to the Crown of Castile, which was sanctioned by Pope Innocent VIII.

Calendar. Eras corresponding with 1884.

The year 1884 constitutes the 108th of the Independence of the United States, until July 4.

1888th of the birth of Christ; our present era having begun four years after his birth.

766th Anno Ordinis of the Knights Templar, dating from their organization in 1118 A. D.

1253d of the Persian Era, which began June 19, N. S., 632 A. D.

5644th of the Creation, according to the Minor Era of the Jews. It ends on the last day of the month Elul.

6243d of the Greater Rabbinical Era of the Jews.

7012th of the World, according to Eusebius.

5828th of the World, according to Scaliger.

5884th Anno Lucis. This date is used by Craft Masons, as they date from the Creation of the World.

5888th of the World, according to Usher and the English Bible.

5376th of the World, according to the Antiochian and Abyssinian Eras.

7386th of the World, according to the Alexandrian Era.

7392-93d of the year of Constantinople, used by the Byzantine historians. This is the same in the Septuagint version of the Bible. It dates the Creation on the first of the Jewish month Tisri, 5508 B. C., or 7392 years ago. There are about a hundred and forty eras respecting the age of the World.

The Hindu year is quite irregular. The Hindus divide the zodiac into 27 parts, from some of which they name the months. While they know our twelve signs, they make no use of them. Each of theirs has thirteen and a half degrees; on an average the sun moves through two and one-quarter every month. In every three years the Hindus gain about one month more than if they reckoned by solar time. Hence, they require an intercalary month in a little less than three years. The Hindu "Cycle of Jupiter" is sixty years, and is important, because it was ever a practice in Southern India, when dating documents, to annex the name of the year of the cycle. One year of Jupiter's cycle answers to the time during which the planet passes through the sign of the zodiac. The correctness of calculation of Hindu lunar motions is little excelled by astronomers of the present day.

Prior to the year 1752, the Christian year began at the feast of the Annunciation, on the 25th March. In Monstrelet's chronicle, we find the year was counted from Lady Day, or else from Easter; and in earlier ages from Christmas. See Anno Egyptiano and Yezdegerdian.

Calid. A sultan of Egypt about 1110. A devotee of Secret Mystic Science, and a disciple of the learned Prince Morieu.

Cancellarius. An office of high rank and responsibility among the Knights Templar of the Middle Ages, performing the duties of, or similar to, the Chancellor.

Canopy, Celestial. Ritualists seem divided in the use of the terms "Clouded Canopy" and "Celestial Canopy" in the First Degree. For the former, see "Canopy, Clouded" and "Covering of the Lodge," by Mackey. It would seem that the unclouded grandeur of the heavens should not be without advocates.

Sir John Lubbock gives the following description of the heavens filled with stars in connection with the latest discoveries: "Like the sand of the sea, the stars of heaven are used as a symbol of numbers. We now know that our earth is but a fraction of one part of at least 75,000,000 worlds. But this is not all. In addition to the luminous heavenly bodies, we cannot doubt there are countless others invisible to us from their great distance, smaller size, or feebler light; indeed, we know that there are many dark bodies which now emit no light, or comparatively little. Thus the floor of heaven is not only 'thick inlaid with patines of bright gold,' but studded also with extinct stars, once probably as brilliant as our own sun."

Cantalever. A projecting block or bracket which supports a balcony. The upper section or table of a cornice. The eaves of the temple or other building.

Capitular Statistics. Brother Josiah H. Drummond, P. G. Master of Maine, whose figures are reliable, fixes the number of Royal Arch Chapter Masons in North America at 132,737 in 1883. See Statistics, Royal Arch.

Capripede, Ratur et Luci Fuge. A burlesque dining degree, mentioned in the collection of Fustier.

Capuchin. One of the monks of the Order of St. Francis. They went barefooted, were long-bearded, and wore a gown or cloak of dark color made like a woman's garment with a hood.

Carmelites. Monks of an order established on Mount Carmel, in Syria, during the twelfth century. They wore a brown scapular passing over the shoulder and diagonally across the back and body, thus crossing the gown from right to left.

Carpenters, Order of. An organized body in Holland and Belgium, with central point of assembly at Antwerp. Their gatherings were at night in some neighboring forest.

Carthusians. A religious order founded by Bruno in 1080, and named from Chartreux, in France, the place of their institution. They were noted for their austerity.

Cartulary. An officer who has charge of the register or other books of record.

Caryatides. The women of Caryæ, a city of Arcadia, or the priestesses serving in the Temple of Diana. Female figures used instead of columns for support in buildings. Figures of women serving to support entablatures. When those of men are used, they are termed Telamones and Atlantes. The inhabitants of Caryæ having joined the Persians after the battle of Thermopylæ, the Greeks, after their victory over the Persians, destroyed the town, slew the men, and carried the women into captivity. The female form, in national costume, was used to support entablatures as commemorative of their disgrace.

Catacombs. Subterranean passages, at times opening into small chambers, formed generally in a soft rock which is easily excavated, such as tufa. Catacombs are to be found in many countries, and are used either as places of sepulture or concealment of the living. Those near

THE NORTHERN SECTION OF THE CATACOMB OF CALLIXTUS.

Rome are on the Via Appia, to whose dreary crypts the early Christians retired for seclusion and worship, and where the bodies of many saints and martyrs were consigned. The above engraving shows but a small portion of the northern section of the catacomb of Callixtus. The passage-ways were labyrinthian, consisting of narrow galleries shooting out in most unexpected directions, and at times ending in a cell for the placing of bodies of the dead, one above the other, separated by the natural stone, with stone doors, on which were placed the letters D. M. (Deo Maximus) or X P, the Greek letters for Christ. At irregular intervals these galleries expand into wide and lofty vaulted chambers, having the appearance of large chapels. They are reported as over twenty miles in length, although, in consequence of the fallen portions, only about six miles would seem to exist. The galleries are generally about eight feet high and five wide. When the Lombards besieged Rome in the eighth century, many of the catacombs were destroyed. Frescoes of considerable value are still to be found in those that are now open. The catacombs in Egypt were extensively explored by Belzoni in 1818, when the sarcophagus of Psammethichus, formed of Oriental alabaster exquisitely sculptured, was discovered and taken to England. The catacombs of Paris are quite extensive. The Twenty-sixth degree, Scottish Rite, contains much on this subject.

Catechumen. One who had attained the second degree of the Essenian or early Christian Mysteries and assumed the name of Constans. There were three degrees in the ceremonies, which, to a limited extent, resembled the Pagan services. Of the three classes, the first were Auditors, the second Catechumens, and the third the Faithful. The Auditors were novices, prepared by ceremonies and instruction to receive the dogmas of Christianity. A portion of these dogmas was made known to the Catechumens, who, after particular purifications, received baptism, or the initiation of the theogenesis (divine regeneration); but in the grand mysteries of that religion—the incarnation, nativity, passion, and resurrection of Christ—none was initiated but the Faithful. The Mysteries were divided into two parts—the first, styled the Mass of the Catechumens; the second, the Mass of the Faithful.

Many beautiful ceremonies and much instruction touching these matters will be found in that most enticing degree called Prince of Mercy, and known as the Twenty-sixth in the Scottish Rite services.

Cathari, Society of the. An Italian heretical secret society organized in the twelfth century, with doctrines similar to the Albigenses and Manichees, proclaiming metempsychosis, and enforcing industry, enjoining charity, establishing schools, and opposed to the judicial death penalty. They disavowed the adoration of the cross, with a feeling that an instrument of torture should not be held in veneration. Their secret services fell under the disapproval of the Church of Rome.

Cenephorus. The officer in charge of the smaller sacred implements used for the sacrifice, and who bore them with the holy incense and other sacred light material in the processional services.

Ceridwen. The Isis of the Druids.

Chaldean Cylinder. The cylinder so recently discovered by Mr. Rassam in the course of his excavations in Babylonia, which has attracted so much attention of the London Society of Biblical Archaeology, is one of the most remarkable yet made known, by reason of the light it throws upon the ancient chronology of the Chaldean Empire. It dates from the time of Nabonides, and records, among various things, that this sovereign, digging under the foundations of the Temple of the Sun-god at Sippara, forty-five years after the death of King Nebuchadnezzar, came upon a cylinder of Naramsin, the son of Nargon, which no one had seen for "3200 years." This gives as the date of the ancient sovereign named 3750 B. C. This, and the fact pointed out by Prof. Oppert, that there was in those early days already "lively intercourse between Chaldea and Egypt," will have to be taken into account by future Bible critics. This destroys the conception of Abraham, the founder of the Jews, as a wanderer or nomad, and establishes the existence of two highly civilized, as well as cultured, empires in Egypt and Chaldea more than 5500 years ago; that the high-road between them lay direct through Southern Palestine, and that Abraham was a native of the one great empire and an honored visitor in the other. Thus has been opened up a new field for investigation in the matter of Akkad and Akkadian civilization.

Chapter of R. Arch Masons, An Old. There is in Boston, Mass., a chapter of Royal Arch Masons which was holden in St. Andrew's Lodge and formed about the year 1764. See Royal Arch Masons, Massachusetts; also, Pennsylvania.

Characteristics. The prefix to signatures of brethren of the A. A. Scottish Rite is as follows: To that of the Sovereign Grand Commander, the triple cross crosslet, as in (1), in red ink. To that of an Inspector-General other than a Commander (2), in red ink. To that of a Brother of the Royal Secret, 3² (3), in red ink. In the Northern Jurisdiction of the U. S., a Rose Croix Knight will suffix a triangle surmounted by a cross in red ink, as in (4). In all cases, it is usual to place the degree rank in a triangle after the name.

Cherubim or Kerubim and Ark. Much light has been thrown upon the plastic form of these symbols during the past few years, not only as to the Cherubim of the Ark of the Covenant spoken of in Exodus, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, but those of Chaldeo-Assyrian art which beautified the gates of the palace of Sennacherib at Nineveh, and other structures.

For the construction of the Ark, God directed Moses that "the Kerubim shall stretch their wings above it, covering the propitiatory with their wings, and facing one another, and the Kerubim shall have their faces turned toward the propitiatory (mercy-seat)." The Kirubi of the Assyrian type, in the shape of bulls with extended wings, in nowise meet the description given above. The figures which can be found in various places upon Egyptian monuments, placed face to face on either side of the Naos of the gods, and stretching out their arms, furnished with great wings, as though to envelop them (Wilkinson, Manners and Customs of Ancient Egyptians, 1878, vol. iii.), more fully meet the idea—in fact, it is convincing, when we remember the period, and note that all else about the sacred furnishings of the Tabernacle, or Ohel-mo'ed, are exclusively Egyptian in form, as well as the sacerdotal costumes. (See L'Egypte et Moïse, by Abbé Ancessi, Paris, 1875.) Furthermore, this was most natural, since the period was immediately after the exodus. The Kerubim of the Ark were remodelled by Solomon after designs furnished by his father, David (1 Chron. xxviii. 18).

THE ISMIAN CAR.

At this epoch, says François Lenormant, Professor of Archæology at the National Library of France, in his Beginnings of History, 1882, the Egyptian influence was no longer supreme in its sway over the Hebrews; that the Assyro-Babylonian influence balanced it; that the new Kerubim, then executed, may have been different from the ancient ones as described in Exodus; in fact, Kirubi after the Assyrian type, which formed a Merkâbâh (a chariot, 1 Chron. xxviii. 18), upon which Yahveh was seated. In the Egyptian monuments the gods are often represented between the forward-stretching wings of sparrow-hawks or vultures, placed face to face, and birds of this kind often enfold with their wings the divine Naos.

THE ARK OF PHILE.

The adornment of the Tabernacle, as mentioned in Exodus, excluded every figure susceptible of an idolatrous character, which is far from being the case in what we know of the Temple of Solomon. In the matter of plastic images, none was admitted save only the Kerubim, which were not only placed upon the Ark, but whose representations are woven into the hangings of the Mishkân and the veil which separates the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. It is therefore most probable that the Kerubim of Exodus were great eagles or birds—Kurubi—while under the remodelling by Solomon these were changed to Kirubi with human faces.

The prophet Ezekiel describes four hay-yôth or kerubim, two and two, back to back, and going "each one straight forward" toward the four quarters. The Kerubim of the Merkâbâh of Ezekiel have four wings—two lifted up and two covering their back—and four human faces set in pairs, to the right and to the left, one of a man, one of a bull, one of a lion, and one of an eagle—the faces of creatures which combine all the emblems of strength depicted by the Chaldeo-Assyrian bull. Ezekiel (Yehezqel) thus describes the Kerubim with several faces which, alternately with the palm-trees, decorated the frieze around the interior of the temple at Jerusalem: "Each Kerub had two faces, a man's face turned one way toward the palm-tree, and a lion's face turned the other way toward the other palm-tree; and it was in this wise all around the house."

The following information, furnished by Prof. Lenormant, on the subject of Cherubim, is important: "Deductions were formerly made from the Aryan theory to support primitive tradition as to origin and form, but these have been overthrown, and the Semitic interpretation made manifest through finding the name of the Kerubim in the cuneiform inscriptions; that in place of referring the Hebrew word kerub to the Aryan root grabh, 'to seize,' the word is more properly of Semitic origin, from the root kârab, signifying 'bull,' or a creature strong and powerful (כְּרוּבָא). Referring to the prophet Ezekiel i. 10 and x. 14, the two parallel passages use the word kerûb interchangeably with shor, 'bull,' the 'face of a bull' and 'face of a cherub,' which are synonymous expressions. Since we have come to know those colossal images of winged bulls with human faces, crowned with the lofty cidaris, decorated with several pairs of horns, which flanked the gateways of the Assyrian palaces, a number of scholars, intimately acquainted with antique sculpture, have been zealous in associating them with the Kerubim of the Bible. . . . The winged bull with a human head figures in a bas-relief in the palace of Khorsabad as a favoring and protecting genius, which watches over the safe navigation of the transports that carry the wood of Lebanon by sea. The bulls whose images are placed at the gateways of the palaces and temples, as described in the above ideographic group, are the guardian genii, who are looked upon as living beings. As the result of a veritable magical operation, the supernatural creature is supposed to reside within these bodies of stone."

In a bilingual document, Akkadian with an Assyrian version, we read invocations to the two bulls who flanked the gate of the infernal abode, which were no longer simulacra of stone, but living beings, like the bulls at the gates of the celestial palaces of the gods. The following is one of the unique expressions made in the ears of the bull which stands to the right of the bronze inclosure:

"Great Bull, most great Bull, stamping before the holy gates, he opens the interior; director of Abundance, who supports the god Nirba, he who gives their glory to the cultivated fields, my pure hands sacrifice toward thee."

Similar expressions were then made in the bull's left ear.

These genii, in the form of winged bulls with human countenances, were stationed as guardians at the portals of the edifices of Babylonia and Assyria, and were given the name of Kirubi; thus, Kirubu damqu lippagid, "May the propitious Kirub guard." Numerous authorities may be given to show that the Chaldeo-Assyrians' Kirub, from the tenth to the fifth century before our era, whose name is identical with the Hebrew Kerub, was the winged bull with a human head. The Israelites, during the times of the Kings and the Prophets, pictured to themselves the Kerubim under this form.*

China. A secret society, akin to Masonry and indigenous to China, is the "Most Ancient Order of Suastica," or the Brotherhood of the Mystic Cross, said to have been founded 1027 B. C. by Fohi, and introduced into China 975 B. C. It contains three degrees: Apprentice Brothers, Tao Sze (or Doctors of Reason), and Grand Master. The Apprentice wears the Jaina Cross, worked on a blue silk ribbon; the Tao Sze wears a cross of silver; and the Grand Master one in gold. The meetings are called "Tents." For Chinese Faith, see King.

There is a District Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons at Hong Kong and South China, which holds its Communications in December.

Chinese Classics and Symbolism. Mr. Giles, well versed in matters pertaining to Chinese literature, customs, and archæology, is the authority for stating that in the written language of the Chinese many curious expressions were in use seven hundred years before the Christian era, or only about two hundred years after the death of King Solomon, bearing close proximity to those used prominently in Masonry. The following quotation from the works of Mencius, the great disciple of Confucius, is given in illustration: "A Master Mason, in teaching his apprentices, makes use of the compasses and the square. Ye who are engaged in the pursuit of wisdom must also make use of the compasses and the square." These two words, "compasses" and "square," in the Chinese language represent "order, regularity, and propriety." Mr. Giles points out that in the oldest of the Chinese classics, "which embraces a period from the twenty-fourth to the seventh century before Christ, there are distinct allusions to this particular symbolism." See King.

Chromatic Calendar. "The Five Points." In the great Temple, usually known as the Ocean Banner Monastery, at Honam, a suburb of Canton, China, we find four colossal idols occupying a large porch, each image being painted a different color. Ch'i-kwoh, who rules the north and grants propitious winds, is dark; Kwang-muh is red, and to him it is given to rule the south and control the fire, air, and water; To-man' rules the west, and grants or withholds rain, his color being white; while Chang-tsang, whose color is green, rules the winds and keeps them within their proper bounds, his supreme control being exercised over the east. The old custom of associating colors with the four quarters of the globe has probably led to the habit of describing the winds from these respective points as possessed of the same colors. The fifth, the earth, the central remaining point, still is conjectural. Thus, we also find in China a set of deities known as the five rulers; their colors, elements, and points may be thus represented:

|------------|--------|---------|---------|
| 1. Black. | Water. | North. | Back. |
| 2. Red. | Fire. | South. | Breast. |
| 3. Green. | Wood. | East. | Mouth. |
| 4. White. | Metal. | West. | Knee. |
| 5. Yellow. | Earth. | Middle. | Foot. |

* "The figures of the Cherubim are said to have defeated Dante's power of constructive imagination."

These again are in turn associated with the planets, and the study of Chinese and Babylonian planet-colors is full of curious points of similarity.

BLACK, typifying the north, has two direct opponents in symbolic colors, and these are red and white. The first as implying ignorance arising from evil passions, the second indicating ignorance of mind. Red-black is called in Hebrew הוּם, Heum, from which comes Heume, an inclosing wall. Black from white, in Hebrew, is שֶׁהָרָה, sehher, signifying the dawn of light to the mind of the Masonic profane. The hand to back, as the words of wisdom are about to be spoken.

In the Egyptian, the black Osiris appears at the commencement of the Funereal Ritual, representing the state of the soul which passes into the world of light. Anubis, one of the sons of Osiris, who weighs the soul in the scales of Amenti, and is the god of the dead, is black. The Conductor, or Master of Ceremonies, Thoth Psychopompe, has the head of the black Ibis. See Truth.

RED. In Hebrew, the fire of love, which burns in the south, is אֶרֶה, are, to burn. On Egyptian monuments, and in their temples, the flesh of men is painted red, and that of women yellow. The same difference exists between the gods and goddesses, except where specially otherwise defined. Man's name in Hebrew signifies red, and as the image of fire is love, it is the universal tie of beings from breast to breast.

GREEN. יֵרֶק, Irg, viridis, verdure. רִקְעָה, the firmament, also the winds. Green designates the beginning, the creation, the birth, as the world was called into being in the wisdom of God by his word of mouth, and Light was to appear in the East. Phtha was the Egyptian Creator of the world; he was at times represented with his flesh painted green, and holding a sceptre of four colors, red, blue, green, and yellow: fire, air, water, and earth. The god Lunus, the Moon, in Hebrew יָרֵחַ, irhe, is formed of one of the roots of green, signifying to found or set in order. Green is the symbol of Victory as well as Hope, in the symbolic colors (of MACKAY, which see).

WHITE. הוֹר, Heur, to be white; הוֹרִים, Heurim, to be noble and pure. The Egyptian spirits of the dead were clothed in white, like the priests. Phtha, the creator and regenerator, was frequently robed in a white vestment, symbol of the egg from which he was born, enveloped in the white or albumen. The head of Osiris was draped in a white tunic. While the Chinese metaphorically represented Metal by this color, the Egyptians and Hebrews made it the symbol of Earth. Its reference to the West would imply the first point whereat the profane bent the knee in supplication to the Deity.

YELLOW. צֹהָב, Tseb, gold color, designates a radiation of light, signifying to shine, to be resplendent. Man, or the male principle, symbolized by ardent fire, was represented by red, and the female principle, identified with the idea of light or flame, represented by yellow or light-colored earth, over which the swift-footed messenger bears the tidings of a Mason's distress and the return of obligatory succor. This light of the fire, the female of divine beauty, the Egyptian Venus, was called Athor, signifying dwelling of Horus, and was thus represented.

Circuit. Fort, in his Early History and Antiquities of Freemasonry, says: "Northern kings, immediately upon acceding to the throne, made a 'gait' or procession about their realms. According to the Scandinavian laws, when real property was transferred, possession was incomplete until a circuit was made around the estate by the buyer and vendor."

During the installation ceremonies of the Master of a Masonic Lodge, a procession of all the Craftsmen march around the room before the Master, to whom an appropriate salute is tendered. This Circuit is designed to signify that the new incumbent reduces the Lodge to his possession in this symbolic manner.

Clavel, T. Begue. An abbé. A French Masonic writer, who published, in 1842, a Histoire Pittoresque de la Franc-Maçonnerie et des Sociétés Anciennes et Modernes. This work contains a great amount of interesting and valuable information, notwithstanding many historical inaccuracies, especially in reference to the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, of which the author was an adversary. Clavel is also the author of another work, published in 1844, and entitled Histoire Pittoresque des Religions, Doctrines, Cérémonies et Coutumes Religieuses de tous les Peuples du Monde. For the publication of the former work without authority, he was suspended by the Grand Orient for two months, and condemned to pay a fine. Clavel appealed to the intelligence of the Fraternity against this sentence. In 1844, he commenced the publication of a Masonic Journal called the Grand Orient, the title of which he subsequently changed to the Orient. As he had not obtained the consent of the Grand Orient, he was again brought before that body, and the sentence of perpetual exclusion from the Grand Orient pronounced against him. Rebold says that it was the act of a faction, and obtained by unfair means. It was not sustained by the judgment of the Craft in France, with whom Clavel gained reputation and popularity. Notwithstanding the Masonic literary labors of Clavel, an account of the time of his birth, or of his death, appears to be obscure. His desire seemed to be to establish as history, by publication, those views which he personally entertained and formed; gathered from sources of doubtful character, he desired they should not be questioned in the future, semel pro semper.

Cleche. A cross charged with another of the same figure, but whose color is that of the field.

College. The regular Convocation of the subordinate bodies of the Society of Rosicrucians is called an Assemblage of the College, at which their mysteries are celebrated, by initiation and advancement, at the conclusion of which the Mystic Circle is broken.

Colleges, Irish. Established in Paris about 1730, and were rapidly being promulgated over France, when they were superseded by the Scottish Chapters.

Collocatio. The Greek custom of exposing the corpse on a bier over night, near the threshold, that all might be convinced of the normal death.

Colored Fraternities. The secret societies of negroes claiming to be Masonic are quite extensive, embracing fourteen Grand Lodges, to wit: that of Arkansas, Colorado, Dominica, Illinois, Indiana, Liberia, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ontario, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina.

Companions, The Twelve. The Rev. George F. Fort relates that the "twelve Companions of G. Master Hiram correspond unquestionably to the twelve zodiacal signs, or the twelve months of the year. The ground-work of this tradition of the twelve is a fragment of ancient natural religion, common to both Oriental and European nations; or, more properly, was derived from identical sources. The treacherous Craftsmen of Hiram the Good are the three winter months which slew him. He is the sun surviving during the eleven consecutive months, but subjected to the irresistible power of three ruffians, the winter months; in the twelfth and last month, that luminary, Hiram, the good, the beautiful, the bright, the sun god, is extinguished."

Connecticut. The first Lodge organized in Connecticut was Hiram Lodge, at New Haven, which received its charter, in 1750, from St. John's Grand Lodge, of Boston. Other Lodges were instituted, some by authority from Massachusetts, others from that derived from New York. A convention of delegates from twelve Lodges assembled at New Haven, July 8, 1789, and organized the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, Pierpont Edwards being elected Grand Master.

In 1796, there were three Royal Arch Chapters in Connecticut. In 1797, these Chapters had entered into an association, probably with the idea of establishing a Grand Chapter. On January 24, 1798, a convention of delegates from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York was held at Hartford, when a conference was had on the subject of the two conventions, the delegates from Connecticut united with those from the other States in forming the "Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the Northern States of America." By the constitution then adopted, the "Deputy Grand Chapter" of Connecticut was established. The title was changed in the subsequent year for that of "Grand Chapter." Webb gives the precise date of the organization of the Grand Chapter as May 17, 1798. See Royal Arch Grand Bodies in America.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was organized in 1819.

The Grand Encampment of Knights Templar was organized September 13, 1827, but is now known as the Grand Commandery.

Conventions or Congresses of Masons in chronological order:—

926. York, under Prince Edwin of England.

1275. Strasburg, under Edwin Von Steinbach.

1459. Ratisbon, under Jost Dolzinger.

1464. Ratisbon, under Grand Lodge of Strasburg.

1469. Spire, under Grand Lodge of Strasburg.

1535. Cologne, by Hermann, Bishop of Cologne.

1563. Basle, by Grand Lodge of Strasburg.

1717. London, by the Four Old Lodges. Organization of Grand Lodge.

1730. Dublin, by the Dublin Lodges.

1736. Edinburgh. Organization and institution of Grand Lodge.

1756. The Hague, by the Royal Union Lodge.

1762. Paris and Berlin, by nine commissioners nominated by the Sov. G. Council of P. of Masonry.

1763. Jena, by the Lodge of Strict Observance.

1764. Jena, by Johnson or Beeker, denounced by Baron Hund.

1765. Altenberg, a continuation wherein Hund was elected G. M. of Rite of Strict Observance.

1772. Kohl, by Ferdinand of Brunswick and Baron Hund, without success.

1775. Brunswick, by Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick.

1778. Lyons, by Lodge of Chevaliers Bénéfaisants.

1778. Wolfenbüttel, by Duke of Brunswick.

1782. Wilhemsbad, an impotent session for purification.

1784. Paris, a medley of Lovers of Truth and United Friends.

1786. Berlin, alleged to have been convened by Frederick Second of Prussia.

1822. Washington, a mutual assemblage of American Lodges.

1843. Baltimore, a mutual assemblage of American Lodges.

1847. Baltimore, a mutual assemblage of American Lodges.

1853. Lexington, Ky., a mutual assemblage of American Lodges.

1855. Paris, by Grand Orient of France.

1859. Chicago. A volunteer assemblage.

1875. Lausanne. A convention of the Supreme Councils of the Scottish Rite of the World, which subsequently led to an eternal bond of unity both offensive and defensive.

Corium. An armor worn by Roman soldiers made of leather scales, and much used in the time of Edward I. The leather leaves or scales overlapping each other, made the armor impervious to arrows, and caused the glance of spears and javelins.

Coronet, Ducal. (Italian, Coronetta.) An inferior crown worn by noblemen, such as that of a British duke, adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis has leaves with pearls interposed; that of an earl has the pearls above the leaves; that of a viscount is surrounded with pearls only; that of a baron has only four pearls. The ducal coronet is a prominent symbol in the Thirty-third degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Cosmist. A religious faith of late recognition, having for its motto, "Deeds, not Creeds," and for its principle the service of humanity is the supreme duty. The design of Cosmism is to join all men and women into one family, in which the principle of equality, together with that of brotherly love (that is, love of the human race), is the predominant one, and the moral and material welfare of all the sole aim and purpose.

The Cosmists are enjoined to act as follows: To give one another encouragement and aid, both material and moral; to cultivate all their faculties; to contemplate all mankind as brethren; to be courteous and forbearing to each and all; to practise charity without publicity or ostentation.

Freemasonry is an intensely theistical institution; but its principles could scarcely be better expressed than those above enumerated as the foundation of the Cosmistic faith; more especially in the motto, "Deeds, not Creeds."

There is an observable difference between Cosmists and Secularists, Collectivists and Positivists.

Cottyto, Mysteries of. These were instituted in Thrace, and thence found their way into Greece and Rome, and were known as the Rites of the Bona Dea. The members were exclusively women. The intruding of Clodius, in female disguise, into the ceremonies, was severely paid for.

Council of Allied Masonic Degrees. England. An organization reported to have been formed in 1880 to embody, protect, and promulgate all side degrees of a Masonic or other secret character, and those otherwise unclaimed that may appear as waifs. The central organization is termed the "Council of Allied Masonic Degrees." One of its subordinates is Ebor Council, at York.

Craft Statistics. See Statistics of Craft Masons.

Crata Repoa. An Egyptian Rite of seven degrees: 1. Pastophoros or Apprentice. 2. Neocoros or Fellow Craft. 3. Melanophoros or Master. 4. Kistophoros, Provost and Judge. 5. Balahate, Knight and Priest Philosopher. 6. Knephnu, King (Royal Arch or Astronomos). 7. Propheta. These were first published in 1770, and appear to have had no really ancient origin or authority.

Cresset. An open lamp formerly having a cross-piece filled with combustible material, such as naphtha, and recognized as the symbol of Light and Truth.

Crimson. (Crimoysin, O. Eng.) A deep-red color tinged with blue, emblematical of fervency and zeal; belonging to several degrees of the Scottish Rite as well as to the Holy Royal Arch.

Crosier. The staff surmounted by a cross carried before a bishop on occasions of solemn ceremony. They are generally gilt, and made light; frequently of tin, and hollow. The pastoral staff has a circular head.

Crosses. In referring to the philosophic triads and national crosses, there will be found in a work entitled The Celtic Druids, by Godfrey Higgins, the following: "Few causes have been more powerful in producing mistakes in ancient history than the idea, hastily formed by all ages, that every monument of antiquity marked with a cross, or with any of those symbols which they conceived to be monograms of Christ the Saviour, was of Christian origin. The cross is as common in India as in Egypt or Europe." The Rev. Mr. Maurice remarks (Indian Antiquities): "Let not the piety of the Catholic Christian be offended at the assertion that the cross was one of the most usual symbols of Egypt and India. The emblem of universal nature is equally honored in the Gentile and Christian world. In the Cave of Elephanta, in India, over the head of the principal figure may be seen the cross, with other symbols." Upon the breast of one of the Egyptian mummies in the museum of the London University is a cross upon a Calvary or mount. People in those countries marked their sacred water-jars, dedicated to Canopus, with a Tau cross, and sometimes even that now known as the Teutonic cross. The fertility of the country about the river Nile, in Egypt, was designated, in distance on its banks from the river proper, by the Nilometer, in the form of a cross. The erudite Dr. G. L. Ditson says: "The Rabbins say that when Aaron was made High Priest he was marked in the forehead by Moses with a cross in the shape of that now known as St. Andrew's." Proselytes, when admitted into the religious mysteries of Eleusis, were marked with a cross. (See Cross, MACKEY.)

Crowns. As the result of considerable classification, Brother Robert Macoy presents nine principal crowns recognized in heraldry and symbolism: 1st. The Triumphant crown, of which there were three kinds—a laurel-wreath, worn by a General while in the act of triumph; a golden crown, in imitation of laurel-leaves; and the presentation golden crown to a conquering General. 2d. The Blockade crown of wild-flowers and grass, presented by the army to the commander breaking and relieving a siege. 3d. The Civic crown of oak-leaves, presented to a soldier who saved the life of his comrade. 4th. The Olive crown, conferred upon the soldiery or commander who consummated a triumph. 5th. The Mural crown, which rewarded the soldier who first scaled the wall of a besieged city. 6th. The Naval crown, presented to the Admiral who won a naval victory. 7th. The Vallary crown, or circlet of gold, bestowed on that soldier who first surmounted the stockade and forced an entrance into the enemy's camp. 8th. The Ovation crown, or chaplet of myrtle, awarded to a General who had destroyed a despised enemy and thus obtained the honor of an ovation. 9th. The Eastern or Radiated crown, a golden circle set with projecting rays.

The crown of Darius, used in Red Cross knighthood and in the Sixteenth degree Scottish Rite, was one of seven points, the central front projection being more prominent than the other six in size and height.

Cumulation of Rites. The practice by a Lodge of two or more Rites, as the American or York and the Ancient Accepted Scottish, or the Scottish and French Modern Rites. This cumulation of Rites has been practised to a considerable extent in France, and in Louisiana in the United States.

D.

D. The fourth letter of the Phœnician, the Hebrew, the Greek, the Roman, and of nearly all alphabets. In Hebrew it is ד, Daleth, signifying the door of life, a representation of which was probably its original hieroglyph, thus:

1 shows the approximation to the Hebrew Daleth; 2, the Greek Delta, resembling the opening of a tent. The numerical value of ד is four; as a Roman numeral it stands for 500. The Divine name in Hebrew connected with this letter is דגל, Daghl, Insignis.

Dactyli. Priests of Cybele, in Phrygia, of whom there were five, which number could not be exceeded, and alluded to the salutation and blessing by the five fingers of the hand.

Dædalus. A famous artist and mechanician, whose genealogy is traced in the Greek myths as having sprung from the old Athenian race of kings, the Erechtheidæ. He is said to have executed the Cretan labyrinth, the reservoir near Megaris in Sicily, the Temple of Apollo at Capua, and the celebrated altar sculptured with lions on the Libyan coast. He is said to be the inventor of a number of the "Working Tools" used in the various degrees of Masonry, the plumb-line and the axe, most of the tools used in carpentry, and of glue. Of him is told the fable of his flying safely over the Ægean by means of wings made by himself. His nephew, Perdix, is the reputed inventor of the third Great Light in Masonry, the Compasses, which are dedicated to the Craft. Through envy Dædalus is said to have hurled his nephew, Perdix, from the Temple Athene.

Dagraim, Hubert. A writer in the Amsterdam Journal of November 3, 1735, on the subject of Freemasonry, which caused an edict from the States General forbidding Masonic gatherings throughout the country.

Dagran, Louis. President of a General Assembly of thirty Lodges, held on St. John's Day, 1756, at the Hague, for the formation of the Grand Lodge of Holland. It was at this December meeting that Baron Van Aerssen Beyerens Van Hogerheide was appointed Grand Master.

Dakota. The Grand Lodge was organized July 21, 1875. In 1883, there were fifteen Lodges, and during the year fourteen dispensations were granted for new Lodges. Membership, 1533. It has a flourishing G. Chapter, and on May 14, 1884, a G. Commandery of K. Templar was organized, with five Commanderies.

Dalmatic. A robe worn by deacons in some Christian churches. Originally made of linen, as shown by early Christian paintings on the walls of the Catacombs at Rome, but now generally made of heavy woollen or silk material, as the planeta worn by the priest. This article of dress has become quite common in many of the degrees of various Rites.

Dambool. The vast rock temple of the Buddhists in Ceylon, containing a profusion of carvings, figures of Buddha of extraordinary magnitude. Monuments of this deity are, in the common Singhalese term, called Dagoba, but the more general name is Stupa or Tope. See Topes.

Daniel. The countersign with "Darius" for Monday in the 32d Degree, Scottish Rite. A Hebrew prophet, contemporary of Ezekiel, about 600 B. C. Carried captive to Babylon in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, but selected for instruction in all the learning of the Chaldeans by order of the Court. His skill in the interpretation of dreams was famed. He became Governor of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar, and the first ruler of the whole Medo-Persian Empire, inferior only to Darius, the king. Under Cyrus he had been Grand Master of the Palace and Interpreter of Visions, as narrated in the 15th Degree, Scottish Rite. He did not return with his countrymen to Judea when granted their liberty. It is a dispute as to when he died, or where, but the majority favor Sushan, in Persia, when he was 90 years of age. At the present day a tomb is shown in this ancient city bearing his name; in fact, it is the only standing structure there. Daniel was noted and famed for his piety, and as well for his worldly possessions.

Dao. The Zend name for light, from Daer, to shine.

Darakiel. A responsive word in the 23d Degree of the Scottish Rite. דרכיאל. Latin, Directio Dei.

Darius I. See Cyrus, King.

Decanus. An officer in the Knights Templar system of Baron Hund, who, in the absence of the Grand Master and his Prior, possessed the right to preside in the Chapter.

Declaring Off. "When a brother ceases to visit and pay his monthly subscription, he thereby declares himself off the Lodge." (Symbolical Dictionary.) In England, A. F. A. Woodford says, the brother "resigns." Various designations rule in the United States, the chief one being "dropped from the roll." In some States the brother is punished by "suspension." If, however, in certain States, he is clear of the books, upon application he can receive a certificate to that effect, and be dropped from the roll. In England he gets a "clearance certificate." In Scotland a "dimit" is issued under the seal of the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

Degrees, when were Three Created? Rather than rely upon any facts that can be produced by American students, it is safer to look to the earnest seekers for historical light in the Mother Masonic country, especially to Brothers W. J. Hughan, R. F. Gould, and "Masonic Student." We therefore make free with their printed opinions. No one has ever contended that the three degrees as we have them to-day were the same before 1717, in arrangement, in teaching, and in terminology, because, considering the alterations which have taken place since 1721, to go back to that date would be an absurd contention. There is undoubted evidence of more degrees than one previous to 1717, and that remembering the continuous division of the Craft into Masters, Fellows, and Apprentices from undoubted evidence, Masonic and un-masonic, it is a fair hypothesis, in fact a rational and logical argument, that esoteric ritual also ran "on all fours" with exoteric arrangements. To assume that the second and third degrees were arranged between 1717 and 1721 or 1723, appears as the actual negation of all evidence and common sense, as it is impossible to suppose that Anderson and Payne and the Masons of 1723 deliberately gave themselves to a tissue of misrepresentation. This position is confirmed by the fact of the existence of a sodality of a secreta receptio in the seventeenth century, as may be found by Plot's statements, Ashmole's diary, the Chester Harleian MS., and other evidence. True, the degrees were technical and honorary, and mark no difference of teaching or secret symbolism, but we have already in the eighteenth century a statement that a distinct threefold division of degree teaching did exist, which is hostile to the hypothesis that our present arrangement dates from only 1717-1721. That in Dermot's statement we have the germ of truth of the whole matter, namely, that from 1717 to 1721 the society was in a weakly state, and that Stukeley's evidence is important, on this particular. But to presume that all should lend themselves to a falsehood in 1723, and again in 1738, and that the Society of Freemasons had concocted the present system between 1717 and 1721-1723, and should suddenly come forward with two new degrees, is contrary to all experience. What evidence is there to build up any new theory? Let proof be furnished by the production of a MS. ritual of any part of the last century. The earliest ritual MS. evidence is transcribed 1715, though probably composed earlier, but this supports the antiquity of the degrees. The printed evidence commences in 1721, and certainly seems clearly to point to a long-continued system of three degrees.

A. F. A. Woodford says: "The Scotch Lodge minutes, or the acknowledged statutes of the Craft Lodges (1598), show two steps, or degrees, to have then existed. Apprentices got the 'Mason Word'; then in the admission of 'Fellow or Master,' there was some sort of ceremony at which Entered Apprentices should, nay must, be present. Subsequently, Apprentices were excluded on the admission of Fellows and Masters. The Apprentices were turned out in 1759."

Deiseil. The counterpart of Tuathal. Mackenzie, in the Royal Masonic Cyclopædia, says "Deiseil is used by the Druids as a term for the circumambulation of the sacred Cairns. Derived from deas, south, and tu, a course; that is in a southward direction following the course of the sun. The opposite is Tuathal, in a northward direction, as is observed at the present day in approaching the grave with a corpse."

Denderah. A ruined town of Upper Egypt, of great interest in consequence of its astronomical allusions on the ceiling of the main portico supported on twenty-four columns, which is covered with figures and hieroglyphics. This is in the principal temple, which is 220 by 50 feet. The numerous mythological figures are arranged in zodiacal fashion. Recent archaeological travellers doubt the reference to astronomy, in consequence of the absence of the Crab. The temple dates from the period of Cleopatra and the earlier Roman emperors, and is one of the finest and best preserved structures of the kind in Egypt. The chief deity was Athor, the goddess of night, corresponding with the Greek Aphrodite. See Zodiac.

Desert. The outer court of a tent in the Order of Ishmael, or of Esau and Reconciliation.

Diu. (The "Shining light of Heaven.") An Indian word applied to the Supreme God, of the same signification as the Greek words Zeus and Theos, and the Latin Deus, Jupiter (Jovis); in Sanskrit, Dewas; in Lettish, Dews; in Gothic, Thius; and in North German, Tyr.

Divining-Rod, or Pedum. The Moderator, or royal Master, was imaged with the ureus on his forehead, the pedum and the whip between his knees. The Divining-Rod was a symbol of moderation. הק, Heq, signifies a law, a statute, or custom; הקק, Heqq, a legislator, a sceptre, a king, moderator, and a Pedum. Hence, a staff. It is represented by a crook surmounted on a pole. The rod of the Rose Croix Knight is dissimilar; it is straight, white, like a wand, and yet may be used as a helping or leaning staff.

Dodd's Constitutions. A pamphlet of twenty pages, in quarto, the title being "The beginning and the first foundation of the Most Worthy Craft of Masonry; with the Charges thereunto belonging. By a deceased Brother, for the benefit of his widow. London: printed for Mrs. Dodd at the Peacock without Temple Bar. 1739. Price, sixpence." The only copy known to exist is in the possession of Richard Spencer, London. See Spencer Manuscript in this Addendum.

Domine Deus Meus. (Adonai elohai.) Found in the Third Degree of the Scottish Rite.

Dominicans, Order of. Founded at Toulouse, in 1215, by Dominic (Domingo) de Guzman, who was born at Calahorra, in Old Castile, 1170. He became an itinerant to convert the heretical Albigenses, and established the Order for that purpose and the cure of souls. The Order was confirmed by Innocent III. and Honorius III., in 1216. Dress, white garment, with black cloak and pointed cap. Dominic died at Bologna, 1221, and was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1233.

Dove, Knights and Ladies of the. An extinct secret society, of a Masonic model, but androgynous, instituted at Versailles, in 1784.

Dowland Manuscript. First published by James Dowland, in Gentleman's Magazine, May, 1815, vol. lxxxv., p. 489. "Written on a long roll of parchment, in a very clear hand, apparently early in the seventeenth century, and very probably is copied from a manuscript of earlier date." Brother William J. Hughan says: "Brother Woodford, Mr. Sims, and other eminent authorities, consider the original of the copy, from which the manuscript for the Gentleman's Magazine was written, to be a scroll of at least a century earlier than the date ascribed to Mr. Dowland's MS., that is, about 1550."

Drops, Three. The mystic number of drops of blood from the White Giant, that in the Persian mysteries restored sight to the captives in the cell of horrors when applied by the conqueror Rustam. In India, a girdle of three triple threads was deemed holy; so were three drops of water in Britany, and the same number of drops of blood in Mexico.

Due Examination. See Vouching, MACKEY.

Dyaus. Sanskrit for sky; bright, exalted. The Deity, the sun, the celestial canopy, the firmament, "Dye na Sore," or "Die Wanderer aus dem Sanskrit Übersetzt." A Masonic romance, by Von Meyern, which appeared at Vienna in 1789, and contains a complete account of Masonic festivities.

E.

E. (Heb., ה.) The fifth letter in the English and in the Græco-Roman alphabets. In form the Hebrew ה is quite similar to Cheth, ח, which has a numerical value of eight, while that of He is five. The signification is window, and in the Egyptian hieroglyphs is represented by a hand extending the thumb and two fingers. It also represents the fifth name of God, הדרור (Hadur), Formosus, Majestuosus.

Ebal. According to Mackenzie, the following was introduced into the lectures of Masonry in the last century: "Moses commanded Israel that as soon as they had passed the Jordan, they should go to Shechem, and divide into two bodies, each composed of six tribes: one placed on, that is, adjacent to, Mount Ebal; the other on, or adjacent to, Mount Gerizim. The six tribes on or at Gerizim were to pronounce blessings on those who should faithfully observe the law; and the six on Mount Ebal were to pronounce curses against those who should violate it. This Joshua executed (Deut. xxvii; Joshua viii. 30-35). Moses enjoined them to erect an altar of unhewn stones on Mount Ebal, and to plaster them over, that the law might be written on the altar. Shechem is the modern Nablous."

Eban Bohan. The stone which Bohan set up as a witness-stone, and which afterwards served as a boundary-mark on the frontier between Judah and Benjamin (Joshua xv. 6; xviii. 17).

Eben-Ezer. (Heb., אֶבֶן-יֵצֶר, stone of help.) A stone set up by Samuel between Mizpeh and Shen, in testimony of the Divine assistance obtained against the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 12).

Eblis. The Arabian name of the prince of the apostate angels, exiled to the infernal regions for refusing to worship Adam at the command of the Supreme, Eblis claiming that he had been formed of ethereal fire, while Adam was created from clay. The Mohammedans assert that at the birth of their prophet the throne of Eblis was precipitated to the bottom of hell. The Azazel of the Hebrews.

Ecbatana. An ancient city of great interest to those who study the history of the rebuilding of the temple. Its several names were Agbatana, Hagmatana, and Achmeta. Tradition attributes the founding of the city to Solomon, Herodotus to Deioces, 728 B. C., the Book of Judith to Arphaxad. It was the ancient capital of Media. Vast quantities of rubbish now indicate where the palace and citadel stood. The Temple of the Sun crowned a conical hill inclosed by seven concentric walls. According to Celsus, there was thus exhibited a scale composed of seven steps or stages, with an eighth at the upper extremity. The first stage was composed of lead, and indicated Saturn; the second, of tin, denoted Venus; the third, of copper, denoted Jupiter; the fourth, of iron, denoted Mars; the fifth, of divers metals, denoted Mercury; the sixth, of silver, denoted the Moon; the seventh, of gold, denoted the Sun; then the highest, Heaven. As they rose in gradation toward the pinnacle, all the gorgeous battlements represented at once—in Sabeian fashion—the seven planetary spheres. The principal buildings were the Citadel, a stronghold of enormous dimensions, where also the archives were kept, in which Darius found the edict of Cyrus the Great concerning the rebuilding of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem.

Eclectic (Bund or) Union. See Eclectic Union, in the body of this work. The Rev. Bro. A. F. A. Woodward says there are now twelve of these Lodges and 1396 brethren.

Ecossais d'Angers, or Ecossais d'Alcidony. Two degrees mentioned in a work entitled Philosophical Considerations on Freemasonry.

Edda. An Icelandic word, literally translated great-grandmother, as referred to in Scandinavian poetry. There are in reality two books of this name which were deemed inspired by the ancient Germans, Norwegians, and Swedes, and there grew out so many myths from these canonical writings, that great difficulty is now experienced as to what were apocryphal. The myths springing from the old German theology are full of beauty; they pervade Freemasonry extensively and so intimately that they are believed by many of the best students to be the origin of a large number of its legends and symbols.

The older of the two, called The Edda of Sämund the Learned, was written in a language existing in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway as early as the eighth century. Sämund Sigfusson, an Icelandic priest born in 1056, collected thirty-nine of these poems during the earlier portion of the twelfth century. The most remarkable of these poems is the Oracle of the Prophetess, containing the cosmogony, under the Scandinavian belief, from the creation to the destruction of the world. A well-preserved copy was found in Iceland in 1643.

The younger Edda is a collection of the myths of the gods, and of explanations of meters of Pagan poetry, and is intended for instruction of young scalds or poets. The first copy was found complete in 1628. The prologue is a curious compendium of Jewish, Greek, Christian, Roman, and Icelandic legend. Its authorship is ascribed to Snorro Sturleson, born in 1178; hence called Edda of Snorro.

Edinburgh-Kilwinning Manuscript. See Kilwinning Manuscript in this Addendum.

Edward the Confessor, King. Said to have been a patron of Masonry in England in 1041.

Edward, Kings. The four kings, numerically known as the First, Second, Third, and Fourth, appear as favorers, abettors, and protectors of the Institution of Freemasonry.

Edward, Prince. Son of George III., and Duke of Kent, was initiated in 1790, at Geneva, in the Lodge De l'Union des Cœurs; was Grand Master of the Ancients, and resigned to the Duke of Sussex on the memorable occasion of the Union in England, 1813.

Edward III. Manuscript. A manuscript quoted by Anderson in his second edition (p. 71), and also by Preston, as an old record referring to "the glorious reign of King Edward III." The whole of the record is not cited, but the passages that are given are evidently the same as those contained in what is now known as the Cooke MS., the archaic phraseology having been modernized and interpolations inserted by Anderson, as was, unfortunately, his habit in dealing with those old documents. Compare, for instance, the following passages:

From the Cooke MS. "When the master and the felawes be forwarned ben y come to such congregacions if ne be the Scher-effe of the countre or the mayer of the Cyte or alderman of the town in wyche the congregacions is holden schall be felaw and sociat to the master of the congregacions in helpe of hym agenst rebelles and up-beryng (upbearing) the rygt of the reme."

Edward III. MS., as quoted by Anderson. "That when the Master and Wardens pre-side in a Lodge, the sheriff if need be, or the mayor or the alderman (if a brother) where the Chapter is held, shall be sociate to the Master, in help of him against rebels and for upholding the rights of the realm."

The identity of the two documents is apparent. Either the Edward III. MS. was copied from the Cooke, or both were derived from a common original.—MACKEY.

Edwin Charges. The charges said to have been given by Prince Edwin, and contained in the Antiquity MS., are sometimes so called. See Antiquity Manuscript in the body of this work.

Eglinton Manuscript. So called because it was discovered many years ago in the charter-chest of Eglinton castle. It is written in the Scottish dialect, and bears the date of "XXVII. December, 1599." An exact copy of it has been published by Bro. Hughan in his Unpublished Records of the Craft.

Egyptian Hieroglyphs. The extent of parallelism between the innumerable hieroglyphs on the tombs and monuments of India and Egypt and the symbols and emblems of Freemasonry, taken together with their esoteric interpretation, has caused very many well-thinking Masons to believe in an Indian or Egyptian origin of our speculative institution of the present day. So close and numerous are these symbols and their meaning that it becomes difficult for the mind to free itself from a fixed conclusion; and some of the best students feel confident in their judgment to this end, more especially when tracing the Leader, "Moses, learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," from that country to Palestine with the twelve tribes of Israel and their successors building that Holy House in Jerusalem, which has become the chief Masonic symbol. Some have abominated this theory on the ground of alleged polytheism existing among the Egyptians; but this existed only at a later day in the life of the nation, as it also existed among the corrupted Jews in its worst form, for which see 2 Kings ch. 17-21.

MSS or MES,

Bro. Thomas Pryer presents this evidence of a monotheistic belief, of pristine purity, among the early Egyptians, ages prior to Abraham's day. We give the hieroglyphs and their interpretation:

May thy soul attain (come)
to

KHNUM (Spirit of God, one of the forms of AMON, the Creator),

The Creator (the idea denoted by a man building the walls of a city) of all mankind (literally men and women).

May thy soul attain to KHNUM, the Creator of all mankind.

How prophetic! were the Books of Hermes, "O Egypt, Egypt! a time shall come, when, in lieu of a pure religion, and of a pure belief, thou wilt possess naught but ridiculous fables, incredible to posterity; and nothing will remain to thee, but words engraven on stone, the only monuments that will attest thy piety."

Egyptian Months. Named Thoth, Paophi, Athyr, Choiak, Tybi, Mechir, Phamenoth, Pharmuthi, Pashons, Payni, Epiphi, and Mesore. The above twelve months, commencing with March 1, were composed of thirty days each, and the five supplementary days were dedicated to Hesi (Osiris), Hor (Horus), Set (Typhon), His (Isis), and Nebti (Nephthys). The sacred year commenced July 20; the Alexandrian year, August 29, B. C. 25.

Elai beni almanah (Hebrew, אלי בני אלמנה, Huc venite filii viduæ). Third Degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Elai beni emeth (Heb., אלי בני אמת, Huc venite filii veritatis). Sometimes applied to the Twenty-sixth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Elect, Symbolical. Fifth Degree of the Reformed Rite of Baron Von Tschoudy.

Electa. Fifth Degree in the American Adoptive system of the Eastern Star.

Elect, Depositary. A degree mentioned in Pyron's collection.

Elect, Grand Prince of the Three. A degree mentioned in Pyron's collection.

Elect, Irish. (Elu Irlandais.) The first of the high grades of the Chapters of that name.

Elements, Test of the. A ceremonial in the First and Twenty-fourth degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Elohim, Jehovah. The first of these two words is an expression used throughout the first chapter of Genesis, as applied to God in the exercise of His creative power, and signifies the "Divine Omnipotence, the Source of all power, the Power of all powers," which was in activity in the Creation. After which the expression used for Deity is Jehovah, which implies the Providence of God, and which could not have been active until the world had been created by Elohim. See Jehovah, MACKEY.

Emounah. (Fidelity, Truth.) The name of the Fourth Step of the mystic ladder of the Kadosh of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

England. During one period of the eighteenth century there existed four Grand Lodges in England: 1. "The G. Lodge of England," located at London; 2. "The G. Lodge of all England," located at York. 3. "The G. Lodge of England according to the Old Constitutions;" and, 4. "The G. Lodge of England and South of the Trent," which last two had their G. East at London.

Concession has been granted that the first Grand Lodge formation was in 1717, and theretofore were held "Assemblies" irregularly convened. The second G. Lodge bears date 1725, and emanated from that immemorial Masonic Lodge that gave such reverence to the city of York. The third in the line was given birth by malcontents who broke from the first parent about the middle of the century. And the fourth, whose existence lasted from 1779 to nearly the close of the century, was instituted by the York Grand Lodge in compliance with the request of members of the Lodge of Antiquity, of London; but its existence was ephemeral, in consequence of the removal of the disturbing cause with the regular G. Lodge, and which granted the number "Two" to the Lodge of Antiquity.

All subordinate Lodges existing at present, and which had their being prior to the union, in December, 1813, were subjects of either the first or the third of the above designated four G. Lodges, and known respectively as the "Moderns" or the "Ancients," these titles, however, having no recognized force as to the relative antiquity of either. The "Ancients" have, at times, been known as "Atholl Masons." The Grand Lodge of England has revised its Book of Constitutions thirteen times since the "Union" of 1813.

English Freemasonry is sui generis, or, as the Rev. Bro. Woodford says, "indigenous and peculiar, in that it is, both in its theory, its unity, and practical development, unlike any other known system. We mean by this that it rests upon the three symbolical grades, but makes the Royal Arch the completion of the Masonic edifice. . . . We have received it from our Masonic forefathers, and such we mean to hand it on to our Masonic children. It is a system which is, after all, the foundation of every other European, American, and Asiatic system; and in our opinion, whenever others have deviated from it, or contracted it, or expanded it, they have done wrong. The English system is, in its practical development, cosmopolitan and universal, and, while it is both reverential and religious in all that pertains to the great truths of Divine wisdom, it deprecates all controversial contention and ignores all denominational declarations."

All this appears sound, but we opine that English Masonry in England changed in its forms and ceremonies from time to time, after having planted the fraternity among distant peoples.

England, The First Record of Grand Lodge of. Bro. R. F. Gould furnishes the valuable information that the minutes of Grand Lodge commence 24th June, 1723, and those bearing such date are signed by "John Theophilus Desaguliers, Deputy Grand Master." They are entered in a different handwriting, under date of 29th November, 1723, 19th February, 1724, 28th "April 1724," and are not signed at foot. On 24th June, 1724, the Earl of Dalkeith presided in Grand Lodge, and the following signatures are appended to the recorded minutes:—

"Dalkeith, G. M., 1724" (sic).

"J. T. Desaguliers, Dep. G. M."

"Fra Sorrell, Senr., G. W."

"John Senex, Junr."

The minutes of 21st November, 1724, 17th March, 20th May, 24th June, and 27th November, 1725, are unsigned. But to those of 27th December, 1725, are appended the signatures of "Richmond & Lenox, G. Mr., 1725" (sic),

"M. Ffolkes, D. G. M.," and two G. Wardens.

Signatures are again wanting to the proceedings of 28th February and 12th December, 1726, but reappear under date of 27th "Ffebruary 1726" [27], viz.—

"Paisley, G. Mr., 1726" (sic), and the next three succeeding officers.

The minutes of the following 27th May (1727) were signed by "Inchiquin, G. M., 1727," and the next three succeeding officers.

The earliest minutes were not signed on confirmation, but were verified by the four Grand officers, or such of them as took part in the proceedings recorded. The minutes say that "the late G. M. went away without ceremony" because Dr. Desaguliers was re-elected Deputy G. M.

Enochian Alphabet. One of the most important alphabets, or ciphers, known to historic Masons is the Enochian, in consequence of the revelations made in that character. Tradition says the Christian princes were accompanied in their journey to Palestine by Freemasons, who fought by their side, and who, when at the Holy City, discovered important MSS., on which some of the historic degrees were founded; that some of these MSS. were in was active about 1750. The Lodge "Irene," at Hamburg, was founded 1757.

Ethanin, or Tishri. The seventh sacred month, or the first month of the Hebrew civil year, commencing with the new moon in September.

Europe. An appellation at times given to the west end of the Lodge.

Eva. The acclamation used in the French Rite of Adoption.

Evangelicon. The gospel belonging to the so-called "Ordre du Temple" at Paris, and professedly a relic of the real Templars. Some believe in its antiquity; but others, from external and internal evidence, fix its date subsequent to the fifteenth century. It is apparently a garbled version of St. John's Gospel. It is sometimes confounded with the "Leviteicon," but, though bound up in the same printed volume, it is entirely distinct.

Syriac and others in Enochian characters; and that on their return, when at Venice, it was ascertained that the characters were identical with those in the Syriac column, spoken of by Josephus, and with the oldest copies in which the Book of Enoch was written, and are of great antiquity. The brethren in the A. A. Scottish Rite are largely instructed as to matters pertaining hereto in the 13th and 14th Degrees.

We present an exact copy of the alphabet, as may be found by comparison with that in the Bodleian Library.

The name He No C H, in Hebrew, signifies "taught," or, more properly, "dedicated." In the Koran Enoch is called "Edris," from darasa, to study, which word, more liberally translated, means, "to read or to study with attention." See Enoch, MACKEY.

En Soph. See "The Dogmatic Kabbala," under Kabbala, MACKEY.

Eostre. Easter, a name given to the paschal festival in the spring of the year.

Erlking. A name found in one of the sacred sagas of the Scandinavian mythology, entitled Sir Olaf and the Erlking's Daughter, and applied to the mischievous goblin haunting the Black Forest of Thuringia.

Espérance. Under the name of "Chevaliers et Chevalieres de l'Espérance" was founded in France, and subsequently in Germany, an androgyn Order. Said to have been instituted by Louis XV., at the request of the Marquis de Chatelet, and Evates. The second degree in the Druidical system. Of the three degrees the first was the Bards, the second Evates or Prophets, and the third Druids or Sanctified Authorities.

Eveillé, Secte des. (Sect of the enlightened.) According to Thory, a society presumed to be a branch of Weishaupt's Illumines that existed in Italy.

Evergeten, Bund der. (From the Greek εὐεργέτης, a benefactor.) A secret order after the manner of the Illuminati. Woodford says it was founded in Silesia about 1792, by a certain Zerboni of Glogan, Lieut. von Leipziger, the merchant Contessa, Herr von Reibnitz, and five others; that Fessler worked in it; that it used Masonic forms. Some of the members got into difficulty and prison at Breslau in 1796, and about 1801 the society became defunct.

Evora, Knights of. There is a very ancient city in Portugal of 1200 population. Quintus Sertorius took it 80 B. C. The Roman antiquities are unrivalled. The aqueduct erected by Sertorius has at one end a marvellous architectural tower rising high above the city, perfect in its condition as when built, 70 B. C. In 1147, King Alfonso I., of Portugal, instituted the Order of the New Militia in consequence of the prowess exhibited by the troops in the siege of Lisbon against the Moors. When they conquered Evora in 1166, the king by decree changed their name to Knights of Evora.

Excalibar. King Arthur's famous sword, which he unfixed from a miraculous stone after the unavailing efforts of 200 of his most puissant barons. Hence, Arthur was proclaimed king. When dying, Arthur commanded a servant to throw the sword into a neighboring lake, but the servant twice eluded this command. When he finally complied, a hand and arm arose from the water, seized the sword by the hilt, waved it thrice, then sinking into the lake, was seen no more.

Exegetical and Philanthropical Society. According to Thory, founded at Stockholm in 1787. It united Magnetism to Swedenborgianism, and lived a brief life at Strassburg.

Exodus. The date of the Exodus has been determined by the excavations recently made at Tel el-Maskhûta. This is the name of large mounds near Tel el-Kebêr, excavated by M. Naville for the Egyptian Exploration Fund, wherein he found inscriptions showing that they represent the ancient city of Pithom, or Succoth, the "treasure-cities" (Ex. i. 11), and that Ramses II. was the founder. This was the Pharaoh of the oppression. The walls of the treasure-chambers were about six hundred and fifty feet square and twenty-two feet thick. From Pithom, or Succoth, where the Israelites were at work, they started on their Exodus toward Etham (Khetam), then to Pi-hachiroth (Ex. xiv. 2), and so on north and east. The Exodus took place under Meneptah II., who ascended the throne B. C. 1325, and reigned but a short period. It was along the isthmus that the Egyptian army perished pursuing the retreating Israelites as they crossed between the Lake Serbonis and the waters of the Mediterranean, amidst the "sea of papyrus reeds," the yâm sâph, that has often proved disastrous to single or congregated travellers. See S. Birch, LL.D., in Ancient History from the Monuments, Brugsch-Bey's lecture, 17th September, 1874; but more particularly the late discoveries above referred to, in Fresh Lights, etc., by A. H. Sayce.

Expert, Perfect. Conferred in three grades, and cited in Fustier's collection.

Expert, Sublime English. Mentioned in Fustier's collection.

Exterior. First grade of the Oriental Rite, cited by Fustier.

F.

F. The sixth letter in the English and Latin alphabets, and the same as the Greek digamma or the phi or ph, and the vau of the Hebrew, which has a numerical value of six. F is the abbreviation of Frere or Brother.

Falk, De, Rabbi. A native Israelite of Fürth, who attracted some attention in London at the close of the eighteenth century in consequence of his presumed extraordinary powers, acquired through the secrets of the Kabbala, as a Thaumaturgist. It was alleged that he could and did transmute metals, and thereby acquired large sums with which he was liberal to the poor. A merry incident is perhaps familiar to the reader. An invitation was extended by the Baal Shem (the sacerdotal pronouncer of the Holy Name) to the Doctor to call as a visitor for a friendly and philosophical discussion. This was assented to, when the Doctor was asked to fix a time. He did so by taking from his pocket a small taper and handing it to his new friend, saying: "Light this, sir, when you get home, and I shall be with you as soon as it goes out." This the gentleman did next morning, expecting an early call, but the taper appeared to have a charmed life, and it was deposited in a special closet, where it continued to burn for three weeks, and until in the evening the Doctor drove up to the door and alighted, much to the surprise of the host, who, with wonderment, had watched the bright-burning taper. As soon as his visitor was announced, the light and candlestick had disappeared. The Doctor was asked if the candlestick would be returned, when he replied, "It is already in the kitchen;" and so it was found. A further incident is mentioned of his leaving upon his death a sealed box to his particular friend, Aaron Goldsmid, stating that to open it portended evil. Aaron could not withstand his curiosity, and one day opened it, and ere the night came Aaron was picked up dead.

Familien Logen. A lodge meeting, according to the Germans, for the consideration of family or lodge matters, at which visitors are expected or requested to retire. At times the term Conferenz Logen is used to designate the lodge open for the disposal of private affairs.

Fanaticism. The English interpretation of the name of the second assassin of the G. Master, or mankind. The frenzy that overbalances the mind. The Gravelot or Romvel of philosophical Masonry.

Fanor. The name given to the Syrian Mason, who is represented in some legends as one of the assassins. Amru and Metusael being the other two.

Favorite Brother of Solomon. The seventh degree of the Swedish rite.

Feix-Feax. A word signifying School of Thought, and is found in the first degree of the French Adoptive rite.

Felicity, Order of. An androgynous system of four degrees instituted in France by M. Chambonnet, 1743, and was transformed five years thereafter into the Knight of the Anchor.

Feuillants. An androgynous system, found in Fustier's collection, and governed by the statutes of St. Bernard.

Fidelity of Baden Durlach, Order of. Instituted in 1716 by Charles Margrave of Baden Durlach. The members of the Order were knighted, selections being made only from the nobles of ancient family. The reigning princes were hereditary Grand Masters.

Field Lodge, or Army Lodge. A lodge duly instituted under proper authority from a grand body of competent jurisdiction, and authorized to exercise during its peripatetic existence all the powers and privileges that it might possess if permanently located. Charters of this nature, as the name implies, are intended for the tented field, and have been of the greatest service to humanity in its trying hours, when the worst of passions are appealed to.

Findel, J. G. A Masonic writer of more than ordinary note, who was admitted in the lodge "Eleusis zur Verschwiegenheit," at Baireuth, in 1856. He was editor of the Bauhütte, an interesting journal, at Leipsic, in 1858, and added materially to Masonic literature in founding the Verein Deutscher Freimaurer, about 1860, and publishing, in 1874, Geist und Form der Freimaurerei.

Firao, Joseph. A cardinal priest who, in 1789, published an edict of the Pope Clement XII. against Freemasonry.

Florian, Squin de. The first accuser of Grand Master Jacques de Molay and the Knights Templar. He was subsequently assassinated.

Fort Hiram. An earthwork erected on October 3, 1814, at Fox Point, Rhode Island, by the Grand Lodge, with the members of the subordinate Lodges, about two hundred and thirty in number. The object was to build a fortification for defence, and the G. Lodge, of which Thomas Smith Webb was Grand Master, through its Deputy, Sen. G. Warden, and W. Bro. Carlisle, were authorized to work on the defences. They formed a procession, marched in the early morning to the Point, and by sunset had completed their labors, consisting of a breastwork four hundred and thirty feet in length, ten wide, and five high. They then marched and counter-marched upon the parapet from one extremity to the other, when the G. Master gave the work the appellation of Fort Hiram, which was approved and sanctioned by the Governor.

Forty. The multiple of two perfect numbers—four and ten. This was deemed a sacred number, as commemorating many events of religious signification, some of which are as follows: The alleged period of probation of our first parents in Eden; the continuous deluge of forty days and nights, and the same number of days in which the waters remained upon the face of the earth; the Lenten season of forty days' fast observed by Christians with reference to the fast of Jesus in the Wilderness, and by the Hebrews to the earlier desert fast for a similar period; of the forty years spent in the Desert by Moses and Elijah and the Israelites, which succeeded the concealment of Moses the same number of years in the land of Midian. Moses was forty days and nights on the Mount. The days for embalming the dead were forty. The forty years of the reign of Saul, of David, and of Solomon; the forty days of grace allotted to Nineveh for repentance; the forty days' fast before Christmas in the Greek Church; as well as its being the number of days of mourning in Assyria, Phœnicia, and Egypt, to commemorate the death and burial of their Sun God; and as well the period in the festivals of the resurrection of Adonis and Osiris; the period of forty days thus being a bond by which the whole world, ancient and modern, Pagan, Jewish, and Christian, is united in religious sympathy. Hence, it was determined as the period of mourning by the Supreme Council of the A. A. Scottish Rite of the Northern Jurisdiction U. S.

Forty-two. The number of judges required to sit by the body of the Egyptian dead pending the examination, and without which the deceased had no portion in Amenti. See Truths.

Forty-two-Lettered Name. See Twelve-Lettered Name, MACKAY.

Four New Years. According to the Talmud there were four New Years. The first of Nisan was the new year for kings and festivals; the reign of a king was calculated from this date. The first of Elul was a new year for the titling of cattle. The first of Tishri was a new year for civil years, for years of release, jubilees, and planting. The first of Shebat was a new year for the tithing of trees.

"Four Old Lodges." Of the four old Lodges which constituted the Grand Lodge of England, on St. John the Baptist's Day, 1717, the "Lodge of Antiquity," No. 2, London, was the first. It is said to have existed from the year 1691, but Brother Hughan thinks it must be much older. The Lodge meets by "Time Immemorial Constitution," having no warrant, and, until the "Union," was first on the roll; a decision, however, by ballot, lost it its numerical priority. As Lodges were known by the house in which they met, Antiquity Lodge was designated "The West Indian and American."

"The Royal Somerset House and Inverness," No. 4, London, is the junior of the four Lodges which constituted the Grand Lodge. At that time it met at the "Rummer and Grapes" Tavern, Westminster, and subsequently at the "Horn," which latter gave the Lodge a name for many years. This Lodge now represents three united Lodges, the names of two of which are to be found in its present designation.

Of the four "original" Lodges, two only have been on the roll from 1740 as of "Time Immemorial Constitution." The original number "Two" ceased working about 1736, and number "Three" accepted a "New Constitution" (now No. 12), and is known as "Fortitude and Cumberland."

"The four original Lodges, after the issue of the 'Regulations' of 1723, simply enjoyed the advantage of being ahead of all the Warrant Lodges, the privilege of assembling by 'Time Immemorial Constitution,' and the honor of having established the first Grand Lodge in the universe." See Freemasonry, Early British.

France. Discussion and an attempted avoidance of a threatening Masonic calamity by a large number of the fraternity of France did not avail to prevent the General Assembly of the Grand Orient of France from completing its overthrow and that of its subordinates by the almost unanimous adoption of the now famous amendment of Art. I. of the Constitution of Masonry, on Sept. 14, 1877.

The following is the text of the amendment and of the original second paragraph which was expunged:

Original paragraph: "Freemasonry has for its principles the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the solidarity of mankind."

Substituted amendment: "Whereas, Freemasonry is not a religion, and has therefore no doctrine or dogma to affirm in its Constitution, the Assembly adopting the Væu IX., has decided and decreed that the second paragraph of Article I. of the Constitution shall be erased, and that for the words of the said article the following shall be substituted: I. Being an institution essentially philanthropic, philosophic, and progressive, Freemasonry has for its immediate objects, search after truth, study of universal morality, sciences and arts, and the practice of benevolence. It has for its principles, utmost liberty of conscience and human solidarity, and its motto is Liberté, Egalité, et Fraternité."

The adoption of the above was after a full and deliberate consideration by its constituents, who for more than a year were in the throes of deep deliberation and judgment.

In pursuing the above course France, through the Grand Orient, rejected Masonry, and not Masonry France. The result was deep and sorrowful consideration of the continuance of friendly relations by the Masonic powers of the world, resulting in the rapid cessation of comity and representation with a once proud Masonic Centre, which in letters of fire substituted force supérieure and principe créateur for the great Masonic symbol of God. Consequently, as there can be no Masonry without God, Masonry ceased to have an organized existence in that country, and although the Grand Orient continues to exist in name, it is not Masonic.

The Supreme Council of the A. A. Scottish Rite in France, however, stood, and still stands, true to all the principles of Masonry, prominently including the Father which is in Heaven, who was, is, and ever shall be in his personal existence. A large dependency of Craft Lodges owe allegiance to the Supreme Council, the number at last report being eighty-three, while those which still linger about the Orient, not confident of their future, including in the geographical boundary of France all its possessions and dependencies, will approximate two hundred and fifty, many of which exist in name only, and are indifferent to Masonry.

A "Central Grand Lodge of France" was attempted in 1879, and at another period a "Grande Loge Symbolique Ecosaise" was assayed by several Lodges which had become discontented with the discipline of the Supreme Council given to "La Justice, No. 133," and to "Les Hospitaliers de Saint Ouen, No. 135," six other Lodges having united with them, but they met with varied success.

Franks, Order of Regenerated.

A political brotherhood that was instituted in 1815, flourished for awhile, and imitated in its ceremonies the Masonic fraternity.

Frederick Henry Louis, Prince of Prussia, was received into Masonry at Berlin by Frederick the Great, his brother, in 1740.

Freemasonry, Early British.

Brother Robert Freke Gould in the history he is now writing, after years of research, aided by the best English Masonic talent, is so succinct as to "late discoveries," that on this most interesting Masonic subject he is quoted: "The minutes of Scottish Lodges from the sixteenth century, and evidences of British Masonic life dating farther back by some two hundred years (than the second decade of the last century) were actually left unheeded by our premier historiographer, although many of such authentic and invaluable documents lay ready to hand, only awaiting examination, amongst the muniments in the old Lodge chests. . . By the collection and comparatively recent publication of many of the interesting records, so much evidence has been accumulated respecting the early history, progress, and character of the craft as to be almost embarrassing, and the proposition may be safely advanced that the Grand Lodges of Great Britain are the direct descendants, by continuity and absorption, of the ancient Freemasonry which immediately preceded their institution, which will be demonstrated without requiring the exercise of either dogmatism or credulity."

"The oldest Lodges in Scotland possess registers of members and meetings, as well as particulars of their laws and customs, ranging backward nearly three hundred years. (These) will form an important link in the chain which connects what is popularly known as the Lodges of Modern Freemasonry, with their operative and speculative ancestors."

There are no Lodge records in England of the seventeenth century, and records of only one between 1700 and 1717.

The original St. Clair Charters (see ante, p. 741) in the custody of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, dated, respectively, 1601-2 and 1628, are referred to by Gould. Then are considered the Schaw Statutes, No. 1, of A. D. 1598 (see ante, p. 691), the Schaw Statutes, No. 2, of A. D. 1599, and their relevancy to "Mother Kilwinning" Lodge; Ayrshire, No. 0, with an important certificate from William Schaw, which proves that the document of 1599 was intended exclusively for the Masons under the jurisdiction of the Kilwinning Lodge. The subject of the "Lodge of Edinburgh," No. 1, and its career from its earliest records, dating back to 1599, down to the year 1736, when the Grand Lodge of Scotland was inaugurated, as most fully described in Lyon's history of this ancient Lodge, passes under review; then appears, as Brother Gould says, one of the adornments of that history in the fac-simile of the record of that Lodge, showing that the earliest minute of the presence of a speculative freeman Mason in a Lodge, and taking part in its deliberations, is dated June 8, 1600. It is to be noted that "the admission of General Alexander Hamilton, on May 20, 1640, and of the Right Hon. Sir Patrick Hume, Bart., on Dec. 27, 1667, are specially recorded as constituting these intrants 'Fellow and Mr off the forced craft,' and 'Fellow of craft (and Master) of this lodg,' respectively." It is assumed that Master simply meant a compliment; certainly, there was nothing corresponding with the ceremony of a Master Mason's degree at that time. Many of the operatives did not view the introduction of the speculative element with favor, and at one time they were arrayed in hostile camps; but eventually those who supported the "Gentlemen" or "Geomatic Masons" won the day, the Domatics having to succumb. In the Lodge of Aberdeen, the majority in A. D. 1670 were actually non-operative or speculative members.

On March 2, 1653, appears the important fact of the election of a "joining member." Again, Lyon declares that the reference to "frie mesones," in the minute of Dec. 27, 1636, is the earliest instance yet discovered of "Free-Mason" being applied to designate members of the Mason craft, and considers that it is used as an abbreviation of the term "Freemen Masons." But while concurring therein, as did Bro. Hughan, Gould thinks the word freemason may be traced back to 1581, when the "Melrose" version of the "Old Charges" was originally written.

"Canongate Kilwinning" Lodge, No. 2, was commissioned or warranted by the Lodge of Kilwinning, No. 0, granting powers to several of their own members resident in the Canongate, Edinburgh, and dated Dec. 20, 1667. This, Bro. Gould says, was a direct invasion of jurisdiction, for it was not simply a charter to enable their members to meet as Masons in Edinburgh, but also to act as independently as "Mother Kilwinning" herself, with a separate existence, which was the actual result that ensued.

"Scoon and Perth" Lodge, No. 3, is much older than No. 2, although fourth on the roll, though the authorities state that it existed "before 1658," and the Grand Lodge acknowledges this date at the present time, placing Nos. 0 and 1, however, as "before 1598," and No. 57 (Haddington) at 1599, there being also many bearing seventeenth century designations.

The Lodge of "Glasgow St. John," No. 3, bis, is next mentioned as "an old Lodge, undoubtedly, though its documents do not date back as far as some of its admirers have declared." The Rev. A. T. Grant is quoted as saying that every line is inconsistent with the charter phraseology of the period to which it has been assigned. But Mr. W. P. Buchan states that the first notice in the minutes of the "Glasgow Incorporation of Masons" bears date September 22, 1620, viz., "Entry of Apprentices to the Lodge of Glasgow, the last day of Dec., 1613 years, compared John Stewart, &c." It is with strong argument allowed the date of 1613, and was placed on the roll of the Grand Lodge of Scotland in 1850 as No. 3, bis; it was exclusively operative. There is now but a solitary representative left of the ancient ateliers, which still prefers isolation and independence to union and fraternity: the old Lodge of Melrose.

"Glasgow Kikwinning" Lodge, No. 4, dates from 1735.

"Canongate and Leith, Leith and Canon-gate" Lodge, No. 5, is authoritatively acknowledged as dating from 1688.

Lodge of "Old Kikwinning St. John," Inverness, No. 6, was granted a Charter of Confirmation on Nov. 30, 1737, its existence being admitted from the year 1678, but a cloud rests upon the latter record.

"Hamilton Kikwinning" Lodge, No. 7, is considered to date from the year 1695.

Thus Bro. Gould, in his remarkable History, continues quoting old Charters, Laws, Statutes, &c., back even to the 16th century, in a most interesting manner, dissenting largely from the early history of Bro. George H. Fort, and as well from the Antiquities of Freemasonry, by Bro. Findel. See "Four Old Lodges," in Addendum.

Frères Pontives. See Bridge Builders of the Middle Ages, MACKEY.

Frey or Freia. Grimme, in his Deutsche Mythologie, pp. 191, 279, traces the name Freia through the ancient Teutonic dialects and explains it to signify plenty and beauty. Also, see Thorpe, Northern Mythology, vol. i., pp. 197, 198. The column or pillar set apart to the goddess Frey in the temple of Upsala became the pillar of beauty or plenteousness. Bro. Fort says, in his Antiquities, the three divinities in the Norse temple at Upsala, in Denmark, Odin, Thor, and Frey, were typical supports of the universe,—Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty,—or the three of the ten columns in the Hebrew sephiroth, in the Jewish philosophy, designated as Sapientia, Pulchritudo, and Fundamentum; which, like the three columns existing in a Lodge of Freemasons, symbolize the moralistic pillars of the world, represented by the Lodge itself. An additional significant fact confronts us at this point: the column of Beauty or Plenty, originally emblematic of Frey, is situated in the south of the Lodge. A Masonic symbol—sheaf of grain—always suspended above that station, denotes plenteousness. Freia may also be comparatively described as the Scandinavian Isis.

Fund, Grand Masters'. A fund over which the G. Master of the United G. Lodge of England exercises exclusive control.

Fylfot. An ancient symbol well known among Heralds. It is sometimes known as the crux simulata, found in the catacombs of Rome, and forms one of the symbols of the degree of Prince of Mercy, Scottish Rite System. See Jaina Cross, in Addendum.

G.

G. (Hebrew, ג, Chaldaic, or hieroglyphic.) The 7th letter of the English and Roman alphabets. In the Greek and many other alphabets it is the 3d in place; in the Russian, Wallachian, and some others it is the 4th; in the Arabic the 5th, and in the Ethiopic the 20th.

In Hebrew it is called "Gimel," is of the numerical value of 3, and its signification is camel. It is associated with the third sacred name of God in Hebrew, גִּדּוֹל (Ghadol), magnus. In Masonry it is given as the initial of God. The Masonic use of the letter tends to the belief of a modern form in the ceremony of the Fellow Craft Degree. See G. O. D.

Gabriel. (Heb., Mighty one of God.) The chief of the seven archangels. He interpreted to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, and made the prophecy of the "seventy weeks" (Dan.

viii. and ix.); he announced the future appearance of the Messiah (Dan. ix. 21, 27). In the New Testament he foretold to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist (Luke i. 11), and to Mary the birth of Christ (Luke i. 26). Among the Rabbins Gabriel is entrusted with the care of the souls of the dead, and is represented as having taught Joseph the seventy languages spoken at Babel. In addition, he was the only angel who could speak Chaldee and Syriac. The Talmud speaks of him as the Prince of Fire, the Spirit presiding over thunder. The Mohammedans term him the Spirit of Truth, and believe that he dictated the Koran to Mohammed.

Gangler. The title given to the candidate in the Scandinavian mysteries, signifying wanderer. The application is also made to the sun.

Gaudin, Theobald. Known as the monk Gaudini. Elected Grand Master of Templars, 1291; died 1301.

Gerbier, Doctor. An energetic Mason, and, as mentioned in The Royal Masonic Cyclopædia, one of the irremovable Masters of the ancient Grand Lodge of France. He is said to have fabricated the title of the Metropolitan Chapter of France, which it was pretended had emanated from Edinburgh, in 1721.

Ghemoul Binah Thebounah. (Prudence in the midst of vicissitude.) The name of the seventh step of the mystical Kadosh ladder of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Gibber, Gabriel. Mentioned as warden under Sir Christopher Wren, and said to have been Grand Master of Masons in England in 1685.

Gibeah. A Hebrew word signifying a "hill," and giving name to several towns and places in ancient Palestine. The only one requiring special mention is "Gibeah of Benjamin," a small city about four miles north of Jerusalem. It was the residence, if not the birthplace, of King Saul.

In the French Rite it symbolically refers to the Master, who must be pure in heart, that the High and Holy One may dwell therein. The word is also used in the Swedish Rite.

Gilead. See Galahad, MACKEY.

Gilgul, Doctrine of. We learn from Bro. Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie's Cyclopædia that certain of the learned Jews have believed, for many centuries, in the doctrine of Gilgul, according to which the bodies of Jews deposited in foreign tombs contain within them a principle of soul which cannot rest until, by a process called by them "the whirling of the soul," the immortal particle reaches once more the sacred soil of the Promised Land.

This whirling of souls was supposed to be accomplished by a process somewhat similar to that of the metempsychosis of the Hindus, the psychical spark being conveyed through bird, beast, or fish, and, sometimes, the most minute insect. The famous Rabbi, Akiba (followed by the Rabbis Judah and Meir), declared that none could come to the resurrection save those of the Jews who were buried in the Holy Land, or whose remains were, in the process of ages, gradually brought thither. In Picard's wonderful and laborious work there are many references to this doctrine. The learned may consult further authorities on this curious subject in the Kabbala Denudata of Heinrich Khunrath, 1677.

Glastonbury, Holy Thorn of. There is an ancient market town in County Somerset, Eng., with a population of 3700, which owes its origin to a celebrated abbey, founded, according to tradition, in 60 A. D. We are further told that Joseph of Arimathea was the founder, and the "miraculous thorn" which flowered on Christmas day was believed by the common people to be the veritable staff with which Joseph aided his steps from the Holy Land. The tree was destroyed during the civil wars, but grafts flourish in neighboring gardens. Glastonbury, has the honor of ranking St. Patrick (415 A. D.) and St. Dunstan among its abbots. In 1539 Henry VIII. summoned Abbot Whiting to surrender the town and all its treasures, and on his refusal condemned him to be hanged and quartered, and the monastery confiscated to the king's use, which sentence was immediately carried into execution. King Arthur is said to be buried in this place.

G. O. D. The initials of Gomer, Oz, Dabar. It is a singular coincidence, and worthy of thought, that the letters composing the English name of Deity should be the initials of the Hebrew words wisdom, strength, and beauty; the three great pillars, or metaphorical supports, of Masonry. They seem to present almost the only reason that can reconcile a Mason to the use of the initial "G" in its conspicuous suspension in the East of the Lodge in place of the Delta. The incident seems to be more than an accident.

עֹז Oz, Strength, O.

גֹּמֵר Gomer, Beauty, G.

Thus the initials conceal the true meaning.

God and His Temple, Knight of. A degree mentioned by Fustier.

Goetia. A contra-distinctive term to Theurgia, the first signifying black magic, the latter white magic. The demons of darkness were invoked and no crime or horror stayed the power. Alchemy and chemistry were the powerful arms relied on.

Golden Lion of Hesse-Cassel, Order of the. Instituted by Frederick II., 14th of August, 1770, under a decree of 6th July, to recompense virtue and merit. The Grand Master is the reigning sovereign of Hesse-Cassel. Motto, "Virtute et Fidelitate."

Golden Stole of Venice. (Cavali-eri della Stola d'Oro.) An ancient order of knighthood, conferred by the republic of Venice. The number of knights was unlimited. The decoration, worn over the left shoulder, was richly embroidered with flowers of gold, and being in width a hand-breadth, fell behind and before to the knee. An ambassador, for some distinctive service, was deemed worthy. The ducal robe was of red material.

Golden Thaler, or Gold G \ddot{u} lden, we are informed by Bro. Woodford, is the St. John's offering, as it was called under the strict observance in Germany, and which amounted to one ducat, or, at the least, one and two-thirds of a thaler, which was paid by every member on St. John's Day. This practice is still kept up in many German Lodges for the benefit of the poor fund.

Gomel. (Heb. גמל, L. retribuens.) Irregularly given as Gomer and Gomez. A word found in the 26th Degree A. A. Scottish Rite, signifying reward.

Gonfalon. (Ital. Gonfalone, O. German, Gundfano.) An ecclesiastical war-flag or banner, a standard; used in several of the chivalric degrees of Masonry. The chief magistrates in Italian cities when bearing this ensign are known as Gonfaloniers. The banner is triune, of white silk, trimmed and mounted with gold.

Goodall. The reputed author of the expose of Masonry, known as "Jachin and Boaz." It is said that he was at one time Master of the W. India and American Lodge, now known as the Lodge of Antiquity.

Gould, Robert Freke. A barrister-at-law, Past Senior Grand Deacon of the United Grand Lodge of England, and author of "The Four Old Lodges,"

"The Atholl Lodges," &c., now engaged on a great work, "The History of Freemasonry, its Antiquities, Symbols, Constitutions, Customs, &c.; embracing an investigation of the Records of the Organizations of the Fraternity in England, Scotland, Ireland, British Colonies, France, Germany, and the United States," to be completed in six volumes, of which three are in the hands of the subscribers, and from which judgment can already be passed of their inestimable value to all Masons. The history is "derived from official sources," and is not of that "creationist school" so continuously indulged in by Masonic book-makers. The first chapter delves in the consideration of "the four systems or sects, from each of which, according to different schools of thought, may be traced the modern system of Freemasonry. These are the Ancient Mysteries, the Essenes, the Roman Collegia, and the Culdees." Then are considered "The Old Charges of British Freemasons," "The Stonemasons (Steinmetzen) of Germany," "The Craft Guilds (Corps d'Etat) of France," "The Companionship," "Medieval Operative Masonry," "The Statutes Relating to the Freemasons," "Early British Freemasonry," &c. From this illustrated quarto work, the liberty has been taken of occasionally making extracts in this Addendum, not, however, without due consideration for the author.

Gourgas, John James Joseph.

Born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1777, of a patrician family, and emigrated to London during the old French Revolution. He became well known as a merchant on the Royal Exchange. Upon coming to America in the earliest days of the century, he was initiated into Masonry in 1803, and was passed and raised before the close of the year. After receiving the Holy Royal Arch, he gave his attention to the A. A. Scottish Rite, then entering upon its youthful vigor, and received the Thirty-second Degree on July 9, 1806, that of Inspector on August 4, 1806, and was one of the six Inspectors General who, on November 8, 1808, established Concordia Crescimus Council of Princes of Jerusalem in the city of Brooklyn. He became Deputy Inspector on Nov. 12, 1808, Secretary of the Holy Empire, N. Jur., in 1818, the Supreme Council having been formed on August 5 of that year. He was Special Deputy from 1822 to 1832, and then became Commander, and so continued until 1851, when he resigned. He died in New York in 1863.

Grain of Mustard, Order of the.

(Ger. Der Orden vom Senf Korn.) An order instituted in Germany, based on Mark iv. 30 and 32, the object being the propagation of morality.

Grand Director of the Ceremonies. An important officer in the United Grand Lodge of England; a similar office to that of Grand Master-General of Ceremonies of a Supreme Council, upon whom the order of the Grand Body largely depends, and who has charge of the service or ceremonies of whatever nature that may transpire.

Grand Elect, Perfect and Sublime Mason. The Fourteenth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite. See Perfection, Lodge of, MACKEY.

Gravelot. The name of the second of the three conspirators in the Master's Degree, according to the Adonhiramite Rite. The others are Romvel and Abiram. The etymology of Gravelot is unknown.

Grumbach, Sylvester. Mentioned in the legend of the Strict Observance, and was the reputed Grand Master of the Templars from 1330 to 1332, and was the twenty-second Grand Master.

Gymnosophists. (Signifying "naked sages.") A name given by the Greeks to those ancient Hindu philosophers who lived solitarily in the woods, wore little or no clothing, and addicted themselves to mystical contemplation and the practice of the most rigorous asceticism. Strabo divides them into Brahmins and Samans, the former of whom adhered to the strictest principles of caste, while the latter admitted any one into their number regarding whose character and kindred they were satisfied. They believed in the immortality of the soul and its migration into other bodies. They practised celibacy, abstained from wine, and lived on fruits. They held riches in contempt, and abstained from sensual indulgences.

Gypsies. Cornelius Van Paun, more generally known as De Paun, in his Philosophical Researches on the Egyptians and Chinese (Paris, 1774), advances the theory that Freemasonry originated with the Gypsies. He says: "Every person who was not guilty of some crime could obtain admission to the lesser mysteries. Those vagabonds called Egyptian priests in Greece and Italy required considerable sums for initiation; and their successors, the Gypsies, practise similar mummeries to obtain money. And thus was Freemasonry introduced into Europe." But De Paun is remarkable for the paradoxical character of his opinions. Mr. James Simpson, who has written a rather exhaustive History of the Gypsies (1866), finds (p. 387) "a considerable resemblance between Gypsyism, in its harmless aspect, and Freemasonry—with this difference, that the former is a general, while the latter is a special, society; that is to say, the Gypsies have the language, or some of the words and the signs peculiar to the whole race, which each individual or class will use for different purposes. The race does not necessarily, and does not in fact, have intercourse with every other member of it. In that respect they resemble any ordinary community of men." And he adds: "There are many Gypsies Freemasons; indeed, they are the very people to push their way into a Masons' Lodge; for they have secrets of their own, and are naturally anxious to pry into those of others, by which they may be benefited. I was told of a Gypsy who died, lately, the Master of a Masons' Lodge. A friend, a Mason, told me the other day of his having entered a house in Yetholm where were five Gypsies, all of whom responded to his Masonic signs." But it must be remembered that Simpson is writing of the Gypsies of Scotland, a kingdom where the race is considerably advanced above those of any other country in civilization and in social position.—MACKEY. See Rommanies.

H.

H. (Heb. ח, Cheth; the hieroglyph was an altar thus, and finally the Hebrew ח.) The eighth letter in the alphabet, and in the Hebrew has the value in number of 8, while the Heb. ה, He,

which is of the same hieroglyphic formation, has the numerical valuation of 5.

Habakkuk. (Heb. חבקק, a struggler, a favorite.) The eighth of the twelve minor prophets. No account is contained in the Book of Habakkuk, either of the events of his life or the data when he lived. He is believed by many to have flourished about 630 B. C. In the 32d Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite, his name answers to the passwords Tuesday and Xerxes.

Habin. (Heb. יבין, intelligius.) Name of the initiate in the fourth degree of the modern French rite, sometimes given as Johaben, or Jabin.

Habramah, or Jabamiah. (Fatum excelsum.) Said to be used in the 30th Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite in France; it is not used in America.

Hacquet, G. A French notary at Port-au-Prince, subsequently a member of the Grand Orient of Paris, and President of the Royal Arch Chapter at Paris in 1814.

Hâfedha. The second of the four gods worshipped by the Arab tribe of Ad, before the time of Mohammed, to which Hûd, or Heber, was sent. These were Sâkia, the god of rain; Hâfedha, the preserver from danger; Râzeka, the provider of food; and Sâlema, the god of health.

Hallelujah. (Praise the Lord.) Expression of applause in the degree of Sublime Ecossais, Heavenly Jerusalem, and others.

Halliwell MS. J. O. Halliwell took the name of Phillips, and edited, in 1840, "The Early History of Freemasonry in England," commonly known as the "Masonic Poem," or "Halliwell MS.," "Brit. Museum Bib. Regia 17 a ff 32." Bro. Woodford remarks, in "Kenning's Cyclopædia," that "it is somewhat curious that to Grandidier and Halliwell, both non-Masons, Freemasonry owes the impetus given at separate epochs to the study of its archæology and history. Mr. Phillips is a well-known writer on general antiquities, and has edited many very curious and important works." Halliwell considered his MS. of a date "not later than the latter part of the fourteenth century," that is, more than half a century before the Strassburg Constitutions. For quotation from this MS., see ante, p. 287.

Hamaliel. The name of the angel that, in accordance with the Kabbalistical system, governs the planet Venus.

Hamilton, Hon. Robt. M. A., M. D. Born 1820; died May, 1880, at Jamaica, of which island he was District Grand Master. This English gentleman was a member of the Queen's Body Guard. He was appointed District G. Master of Jamaica, Nov. 5, 1858; District G. Supt. of Royal Arch Masons, Jan. 10, 1859; Prov. G. M. M. M., 1877; and was a supernumerary member of the Supreme Council, 33d, of England, and Prov. G. Master of the Royal Order of Scotland.

Hands, United. Clasped hands are a symbol of fidelity and trust. A Spanish work was published at Vittoria, in 1774, where three hands are shown united in the vignette on the title.

Haphtziel. (Heb. הפזיאל, Voluntas Dei.) A covered word used in the 23d Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Har. The name of the second king in the Scandinavian Mysteries.

Harbinger. The title of an officer in the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, and also in the Knights of St. John the Evangelist.

Haruspices, Order of. The word Haruspice appears to come from haruga or harvir, a ram for offering, and spicere, to look; therefore implying a soothsayer or aruspice. The founder of the Etruscan order was Tages, doubtless a myth of self-creative power. This order is claimed to have been re-established in Rome at the time of the foundation of the city. It embraced two divisions, those who formed their judgment from the movements and habits of animals as well as the flight of birds, and those who judged and foretold events by the inspection of the entrails of newly killed animals. These were the precursors of naturalists and physiologists. The two sections of the order were recognized as Haruspex, ab aris aspiciendis, and Extispex, ab extis inspiciendis.

Hayti. Freemasonry, which had been in existence for several years in the island of Hayti, was entirely extinguished by the revolution which drove out the white inhabitants. In 1809, the Grand Lodge of England granted a charter for a Lodge at Port-au-Prince, and for one at Cayes. In 1817, it constituted two others, at Jeremias and at Jacmel. Subsequently, a Provincial Grand Lodge was established under obedience to England. Jan. 25, 1824, this Provincial Grand Lodge declared its independence and organized the Grand Orient of Hayti, which is still in existence; but in consequence of the want of official correspondence, we are left in great ignorance as to the actual condition of Freemasonry in Hayti.

Hebrew Chronology. The ecclesiastical year commences 1st Nisan, March, but the civil reckoning begins 1st Tishri, September, which is New Year's day.

The following dates are accepted by the Hebrews, as given by Dr. Zunz in Remarks prefacing "The 24 Books of the Holy Scriptures according to the Massoretic Text."

BEFORE COMMON ERA.

3988, Creation.

2332, Flood.

2040, Abraham born.

1575, Moses born.

1495, Exodus.

1051, David acknowledged king.

BEFORE COMMON ERA.

- 1015, First Temple commenced.
- 586, First Temple destroyed.
- 536, Cyrus's Decree.
- 516, Second Temple completed.
- 330, Alexander conquers Palestine.

The succeeding dates are in accord with the research of other authorities.

The Temple was dedicated on five occasions:

1st. B. C. 1004, 15th day of Tishri (Ethanim and Abib) (1 Kings viii. 2-62).

2d. B. C. 726, when purified from the abominations of Ahaz.

3d. B. C. 516, 3 Adar, upon completion of Zerubbabel's Temple.

4th. B. C. 164, 25th Kislev, after the victory of Judas Maccabæus over the Syrians, the service lasted eight days.

5th. B. C. 22, upon completion of Herod's Temple.

The three Temples were destroyed on the same day and month of the year. The "threefold destruction" of the Temple took place on the 9th Ab, or fifth ecclesiastical month. The destruction of the Solomonian Temple, by Nebuchadnezzar, took place B. C. 588, or four hundred and sixteen years after dedication. The taking of the city of Jerusalem by Titus is commemorated as a fast day on the 17th Tamuz.

Passover, 14th Nisan; "Little" Passover, 15th Iyar.

Pentecost, or "First Fruits," commemorating the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, 6th Sivan.

Great Day of Atonement, 10th Tishri.

Feast of Tabernacles, 15-21 Tishri.

Fast for commencement of siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, 10th day of Tebeth.

Feast of Purim, 14th and 15th Adar.

King Cyrus liberated the Jews, B. C. 538.

King Darius confirmed the decree, B. C. 520. See Cyrus, King.

Hebrew Faith. See Talmud.

Heler, A. A tyler or tegulator. From the Anglo-Saxon "hılan." Also written "Hillyar" and "Hilliar."

Hermadad, The. (Spanish, "Brotherhood.") An association of the principal cities of Castile and Aragon bound by a solemn league for the defence of their liberties in time of trouble. The sovereigns approved this brotherhood as agents for suppressing the increasing power of the nobles, and without cost to the government. The Hermadad was first established in Aragon in the thirteenth century, and in Castile about thirty years later, while, in 1295, thirty-five cities of Castile and Leon formed a joint confederacy, pledging themselves to take summary vengeance on every robber noble who injured a member of the association. The Santa, or Holy Brotherhood, finally checked so effectually the outrages of the nobles, that Isabella of Castile, in 1496, obtained the sanction of the Cortez to reorganize and extend it over the whole kingdom.

Hermetic Philosophy. Pertaining or belonging to that species of philosophy which pretends to solve and explain all the phenomena of nature from the three chemical principles, salt, sulphur, and mercury. Also that study of the sciences as pursued by the Rosicrucian fraternity. A practice of the arts of alchemy and similar pursuits, involving a duplex symbolism with their peculiar distinctions.

Herring, James. Born in London, England, January 12, 1794; died in France, October 8, 1867; buried in Greenwood Cemetery, New York, October 27, 1867. The family emigrated to America in 1805. James was initiated in Solomon's Lodge, Somerville, New Jersey, in 1816. He was Master of Clinton Lodge, New York city, in 1827, 1828, 1832, and 1834, a period when the anti-Masonic spirit was in its zenith. He, with the remaining members of Clinton Lodge, united with St. John's, No. 1, and met in union December 18, 1834. He instituted the formation of Lodge of Strict Observance, which was constituted by Grand Lodge, December 27, 1843, R. W. Bro. Herring being the Master, with which Lodge he remained until his death. On the 3d September, 1828, he was appointed Assistant Grand Secretary, and on June 3, 1829, was elected Grand Secretary, which office he retained until 1846. He sided with the "Phillips" or "Herring" Grand Body at the split in Grand Lodge on June 5, 1849, and remained its Grand Secretary until 1858, when, in June, the two Grand Lodges were fused. He was a delegate to the Convention of Grand Lodges held in Washington March 7, 1842. Bro. Herring delivered the oration, on the 25th August, 1847, in St. John's Lodge, in commemoration of the M. W. G. Masters, Morgan Lewis and Alex. H. Robertson, and other eminent Masons, on the occasion of the First Lodge of Sorrow held in America in the English language. He was exalted in Jerusalem Chapter, No. 8, R. Arch. N. Y., January 5, 1817, dubbed a Knight Templar in Columbian Commandery, No. 1, N. Y., and was received a Sov. G. I. General, 33d Scottish Rite. Bro. Herring was a P. H. Priest, P. G. G. Sec. of the G. G. Chapter, U. S., P. G. Master of the G. Encampment, N. Y., and Officer of the G. G. Encampment of U. S., and P. G. Representative of the Orients of Brazil and France.

Hesse Cassel. Freemasonry appears to have been founded in this electorate in 1743, by a Lodge at Marburg, called "Zu den drei Löwen," which afterwards took the name of "Marc Aurel zum flammenden Stern." A lodge also appears to have existed in 1771, at Cassel, called "Zum blauen Löwen." In 1817 the Grand Mother Lodge of Hesse Cassel was founded, which lasted until 1821, when the government closed all Lodges. In 1849 one was re-opened by General von Helmschwerdt, but it was closed in 1855. It is now understood that this Lodge has been reopened.

Hibbut-Hakkeber. (Beating of the sepulchre.) A Mohammedan belief as to the state of the soul after death. The form and mode of judgment is explained in Al Koran. The sarcophagus of an orthodox Moslem is so constructed that the deceased can sit upright when notified by his angel of the approach of the examiners, who question him as to his faith in the unity of God and the mission of Mohammed. Satisfactory answers insure peace; but if to the contrary, he is beaten on the temples with iron maces until he roars with anguish. The two angels, Monker and Nakî, then press the earth upon the body, which is gnawed and stung by ninety-nine seven-headed dragons until the day of resurrection. As the Mohammedan was an imitative religion, we naturally look for the origin of its customs and beliefs in older faiths; thus the Hibbut-Hakkeber is found in the Jewish, which taught that the angel of death would sit on a new-made grave, the soul would return to the body, which would stand up, the angel striking it thrice with a chain, half iron and half fire; at the first blow all the limbs were loosened, at the second the bones were dispersed, but gathered again by angels, and the third stroke reduces it to dust. This need not occur to those who died on the Sabbath or in the land of Israel. See Gilgul.

Hieronymites. A hermit order established in the fourteenth century, formed from the third Order of St. Francis. Followers of Thomas of Siena, who established themselves among the wild districts of the Sierra Morena, and so forming a community, obtained approval of Pope Gregory XI. in 1374.

Hierophant, or Mystagog. The Chief Priest of the Eleusinians, selected from the grade of Eumolpids. He was selected for his imposing personal presence, and his dignity was sustained by the grandeur of his attire, his head encircled with a costly diadem. He was required to be perfect in animal structure, without blemish, and in the vigor of life, with a commanding voice. He was presumed to be surrounded by a halo of holiness. His duty was to maintain and also expound the laws. He was the introducer of the novices into the Eleusinian Temple, and passed them from the lesser into the greater mysteries, where he became the Demiurg, and impressed the initiate, while instructing him, by his manner and voice. His title of Mystagog was awarded because he alone revealed the secret or mystery.

Hierophylax. Title of the guardian of the holy vessels and vestments, as used in several Rites.

Hiram. The King of Tyre; was the ally of David, as well as of Solomon, and was material in his service toward the building of the Holy House, notwithstanding the God of the Hebrew differed essentially from the ideal god of the people of Tyre. Hiram reigned over the Tyrians for thirty-four years; he permitted Solomon's ships to participate in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean, and Jewish sailors, under the instructions of Tyrian mariners, were taught how to bring from India the gold to enrich their people and beautify the temple of their king. Tradition says that Hiram gave his daughter in marriage to King Solomon (see MACKEY).

Near Tyre there is a tomb which, to this day, has been pointed out as that of Hiram, King of Tyre, as delineated below.

Hittites. A powerful nation, whose two chief seats were at Kadesh, on the Orontes and Carchemish, on the Euphrates, and who subjected as allies, forces from Palestine, Lydia, and the Troad. This great empire had at times contended with the Egyptian monarchs before the days of the exodus. The Assyrians also had felt their power. They were foremost in arms and in the arts, and carried their religion to the shores of the Ægean; in fact, as shown by the recent explorations and discoveries of 1879, the early civilization of Greece and other European nations was as much indebted to them as it was to the Phœnicians. Egyptian inscriptions bear out the truth of these discoveries, and more firmly establish Biblical history. Jerusalem came within the influence of this great empire. The Hittites were finally subdued by the capture of their famous capital, Carchemish, by Sargon, B. C. 717. For Biblical references, see Judges i. 26; 1 Kings x. 28, 29; 2 Kings vii. 6.

The system of writing by the Hittites was unique; their letters were hieroglyphic and their sculptures a peculiar and curious style of art, some of which may be found in the British Museum. See Fresh Lights, etc., by Sayce, chap. 5.

Hoben. The name given, in some of the high degrees, to one of the three conspirators commemorated in the Master's Degree. The derivation is uncertain. Oben, in Hebrew, means a stone; or it may be a corruption of Habbone, the Builder or Mason.

Hodin. The Blind Fate mentioned in the Scandinavian mysteries. See Balder.

Holy City, Knight of the. The fifth and last of the degrees of the rectified Rite of the Benevolent Knights of the Holy City, or the Rite of Strict Observance, settled at Wilhelmsbad in 1782.

Hom. The tree of life and man in the Zoroastrian doctrine of the Persians.

Homaged. First employed by Entick, in his edition of the constitutions, in reference to the installation of the Earl of Kintore, in 1740, as Grand Master: "Who having been homaged and duly congratulated according to the forms and solemnity of Masonry." He never repeats the word, using afterwards the expression, "received the homage." Noorthouck adopts this latter expression in three or four instances, but more generally employs the word "recognized" or "selected." The expression "to do homage" to the Grand Master at his installation, although now generally disused, is a correct one,—not precisely in the feudal sense of homagium, but in the more modern one of reverence, obedience, and loyalty.

Hospitaller. An officer in each of the bodies of the A. A. Scottish Rite, and in the Modern French Rite, whose duty it is to collect the obligatory contributions of the members, and, as the custodian, to disburse the same, under the advisement of the Master, to needy brethren, or even worthy profanes who may be in distress. The fund is entirely a secret one, and is reserved apart from all other receipts and disbursements.

Houel. A Grand Officer of the G. Orient in France in 1804. G. Orator of the Grand Chapter in 1814.

Hughan, Wm. James. The history of Masonry in England, in which the brotherhood of the world is so deeply interested, will never have justice done to its historians unless there is placed among the first entitled to the crown of immortality the name of William James Hughan. He was initiated in St. Aubyn Lodge, No. 954, Devonport, July 14, 1863, exalted in 1865 in Royal Arch Ch., No. 50, Glasgow, and has been honored with membership in many Lodges and departments of Masonry, including the Order of the Temple, Royal Order of Scotland, Scottish Rite, Rosicrucians, etc. The fraternity has an international interest in him, and look forward hopefully to the attainments by his continued labors, which have resulted already so favorably.

Hur. (Heb. הוּר, liberty.) A term used in the Fourth Degree of Perfect Mistress in the French Rite of Adoption.

I.

I. The ninth letter in the alphabets of Western Europe, called by the Greeks Iota, after its Shemitic name. The Hebrew equivalent is י, of the numerical value of 10, and signifies a hand. The oldest forms of the letter, as seen in the Phœnician and Samaritan, have a rude resemblance to a hand with three fingers, but by a gradual simplification, the character came to be the smallest in the alphabet, and iota, or

"jot," is a synonym for a trifle. The thumb and two fingers are much used, and are of great significance, in religious forms, as well as in Freemasonry. It is the position of the hand when the Pope blesses the congregation, and signifies the Three in One. The Hebrew letter ain, א, with the numerical value of 70, possesses and gives the English sound of the letter i.

I-Colm-Kill. An island south of the Hebrides, once the seat of the Order of the Culdees, and contains the ruins of the monastery of St. Columba, founded A. D. 565. Tradition plants the foundation of the Rite of Heredom on this island.

Iconoclasts. (Gr. eikon, image, and klazo, I break.) The name used to designate those in the Church, from the eighth century downward, who have been opposed to the use of sacred images, or, rather, to the paying of religious honor or reverence to such representations. Image-worship prevailed extensively in the sixth and seventh centuries in the Eastern Empire. The iconoclast movement commenced with the imperial edict issued, in 726, by the Emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, who allowed images only of the Redeemer. The second decree was issued in 730. This was opposed strenuously by Popes Gregory II. and III., but without avail.

Idaho. Two Lodges holding charters from the Grand Lodge of Oregon and one from that of Washington Territory met in convention at Idaho City, on December 10, 1867, and organized the Grand Lodge of Idaho, which in its sessions is migratory. Royal Arch Masonry was introduced by the General Grand Chapter of the United States, which granted a charter for Idaho Chapter at Idaho City, September 18, 1868, for Cypress at Silver City, and Boise at Boise City, both September 20, 1870.

Ijar. (יָאָר.) (Zif.) The eighth month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding with the months of April and May, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Illuminate Theosophists. One of the grades of Benedict Chastanier, apparently of a Swedenborgian nature.

Imaum. The appellation given to the most honored teacher of Mohammedanism. The title of the Sultan, as the spiritual chief of all Moslems.

Immaterialism. A doctrine relating to the quality of God and of the human soul, showing that He forms an absolute contrast to matter, and is the basis of the qualities of eternity, omnipotence, and unchangeableness. The immateriality of the soul includes simplicity as another of its qualities.

Impost. The point where an arch rests on a wall or column. Husenbeth says imposts were "members of a secret society of Tyrian artists who were hired by King Solomon to erect the temple, in order to distinguish them from the Jews, who performed the more humble labors, were honored with the epithet of free annexed to the name of builder or Mason, and, being talented foreigners, were freed from the usual imposts paid to the state by the subjects of Solomon."

Incense. Regulations for Use. From the Talmud we learn that the mixture of the perfume of incense was composed of balm, mycha, galbanum, frankincense, of each an equal weight, viz., 70 manehs; myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, of each an equal weight, 16 manehs; costus, 12 manehs; the rind of an odoriferous tree, 3 manehs; cinnamon, 9 minehs; soap of Carsine, 9 kabs; wine of capers, 3 seahs and 3 kabs, and if caper wine could not be had, strong white wine was substituted for it; salt of Sodom, the fourth part of a kab, and of an herb called maa-a-lay o-shon, a small quantity. Rabbi Nathan said a small quantity of the amber of Jordan. If honey was mixed with it, it was profane; and if it was deficient in any one of its ingredients, the priest was accounted worthy of death.

Rabbi Simeon, the son of Gamliel, says, that the balm issues from an incision in the tree called balsamon. The soap of Carsina was to refine the omycha, that it might have a handsome appearance. The wine of capers was brought to soak the cloves or mycha therein, that it might become hard. And though the "water from the feet" was proper for the purpose, yet it was not used because it was not decent to bring it into the temple.

Increase of Wages. (Augmentation de gages.) To ask for an increase of wages, is, in the technical language of French Masonry, to apply for advancement to a higher degree.

Indian Calendar. The Indian or Hindu year begins in April, thus: 1st Vaisakha, 13th April; 1st Jyaishtha, 14th May; 1st Ashadha, 14th June; 1st Sravana, 16th July; 1st Bhadrapada, 16th August; 1st Asvina, 16th September; 1st Kartika, 17th October; 1st Agrahayana or Margasirsha, 16th November; 1st Pansha, 15th December; 1st Magha, 13th January; 1st Phalgun, 12th February; 1st Caitra, 13th March. The days of the week, commencing with Sunday, are Aditya, Soma, Mangala, Budha, Guru, Sukra, and Sani. The Hindu era, until April 13, 1885, is 1937.

Indian Faith. See Buddhism.

Indische Mysterien. Indian Mysteries. In the German Cyclopædia we find the following: "The East Indians have still their mysteries, which it is very probable they received from the ancient Egyptians. (?) These mysteries are in the possession of the Brahmans, and their ancestors were the ancient Brachmen.

"It is only the sons of these priests who are eligible to initiation. Had a grown-up youth of the Brachmen sufficiently hardened his body, learned to subdue his passions, and given the requisite proofs of his abilities at school, he must submit to an especial proof of his fortitude before he was admitted into the mysteries, which proofs were given in a cavern. A second cavern in the middle of a high hill contained the statues of nature, which were neither made of gold, nor of silver, nor of earth, nor of stone, but of a very hard material resembling wood, the composition of which was unknown to any mortal.

"These statues are said to have been given by God to his Son, to serve as models by which he might form all created beings. Upon the crown of one of these statues stood the likeness of Bruma, who was the same with them as Osiris was with the Egyptians. The inner part, and the entrance also into this cavern, was quite dark, and those who wished to enter into it were obliged to seek the way with a lighted torch. A door led into the inner part, on the opening of which the water that surrounded the border of the cavern broke loose.

"If the candidate for initiation was worthy, he opened the door quite easily, and a spring of the purest water flowed gently upon him and purified him. Those, on the contrary, who were guilty of any crime, could not open the door; and if they were candid, they confessed their sins to the priest, and besought him to turn away the anger of the gods by prayer and fasting.

"In this cavern, on a certain day, the Brachmen held their annual assembly. Some of them dwelt constantly there; others came there only in the spring and harvest—conversed with each other upon the doctrines contained in their mysteries, contemplated the hieroglyphics upon the statues, and endeavored to decipher them. Those among the initiated who were in the lowest degrees, and who could not comprehend the sublime doctrines of one God, worshipped the sun and other inferior divinities. This was also the religion of the common people. The Brahmans, the present inhabitants of India, those pure descendants of the ancient Brachmen, do not admit any person into their mysteries without having first diligently inquired into his character and capabilities, and duly proved his fortitude and prudence. No one could be initiated until he had attained a certain age; and before his initiation the novice had to prepare himself by prayer, fasting, and almsgiving, and other good works, for many days.

"When the appointed day arrived he bathed himself and went to the Guru, or chief Brahman, who kept one of his own apartments ready in which to perform this ceremony. Before he was admitted he was asked if he earnestly desired to be initiated?—if it was not curiosity which induced him to do so?—if he felt himself strong enough to perform the ceremonies which would be prescribed to him for the whole of his life, without the exception of a single day?

"He was at the same time advised to defer the ceremony for a time, if he had not sufficient confidence in his strength. If the youth continued firm in his resolution, and showed a zealous disposition to enter into the paths of righteousness, the Guru addressed a charge to him upon the manner of living, to which he was about to pledge himself for the future. He threatened him with the punishment of heaven if he conducted himself wickedly; promised him, on the contrary, the most glorious rewards if he would constantly keep the path of righteousness. After this exhortation, and having received his pledge, the candidate was conducted to the prepared chamber, the door of which stood open, that all those who assembled might participate in the offering about to be made.

"Different fruits were thrown into the fire, while the High Priest, with many ceremonies, prayed that God might be present with them in that sacred place. The Guru then conducted the youth behind a curtain, both having their heads covered, and then gently pronounced into his ear a word of one or two syllables, which he was as gently to repeat into the ear of the Guru, that no other person might hear it. In this word was the prayer which the initiated was to repeat as often as he could for the whole day, yet in the greatest stillness and without ever moving the lips. Neither durst he discover this sacred word unto any person. No European has ever been able to discover this word, so sacred is this secret to them. When the newly initiated has repeated this command several times, then the chief Brahman instructs him in the ceremonies, teaches him several songs to the honor of God, and finally dismisses him with many exhortations to pursue a virtuous course of life." See Pitris.

Ineffable Triangle. The two triangles encrusted one upon the other, containing the Ineffable Name in Enochian characters, represented in the eleventh of the Ineffable series. Good and evil, light and darkness, life and death, are here not wanting in symbolism, foreshadowing the philosophic degrees, and furnishing the true original of the two interlaced triangles adopted in modern Masonry. See Enochian Alphabet.

Inigo Jones MS. Brother Gould's History (vol. i., p. 63) informs us that this MS. was published only in the Masonic Magazine, July, 1881. A very curious folio MS., ornamented title and drawing by Inigo Jones, old red morocco, gilt leaves, dated 1607, was sold by Patrick & Simpson, November 12, 1879, and described as "The Ancient Constitutions of the Free and Accepted Masons." The revered Brother Woodford became its possessor, who mentions it as "a curious and valuable MS. per se, not only on account of its special verbiage, but because it possesses a frontispiece of Masons at work, with the words 'Inigo Jones delin.' at the bottom. It is also highly ornamented throughout, both in the capital letters and with 'finals.' It is of date 1607 . . . It is a peculiarly interesting MS. in that it differs from all known transcripts in many points, and agrees with no one copy extant." Brother Gould remarks, "This, one of the latest 'discoveries,' is certainly to be classed amongst the most valuable of existing versions of our manuscript 'Constitutions.'"

Initiate into the Sciences, The. Brother Kenneth Mackenzie informs us that this is the title of the second degree of a Masonic system founded on the doctrines and principles of Pythagoras.

Inner Order. Name of the sixth grade of Von Hund's Templar system.

Insect Shermah. A Jewish belief that the Solomonian Temple was constructed by Divine means, that the stones were squared and polished by a specially-created worm called samis, and that the stones by innate power came to the temple ground, and were placed in position by angelic aid. The worm has been designated "the Insect Shermah."

Intolerance. The arch-enemy of Freemasonry. Toleration is one of the chief foundation-stones of the Fraternity, and Universality and Brotherly Love are ever taught. Notwithstanding, intolerance has, and ever has had, its grip upon the brotherhood, and insidiously does its silent and undermining work. Human powers are limited or circumscribed. Man by nature is weak, and is largely the creature of early education; yet no institution has such resisting power and is of such avail as Freemasonry against that great enemy of man, which has destroyed more of the human race than any other evil power. The synonym may be found in the Third and Tenth degrees, A. A. Scottish Rite.

Inversion of Letters. In some of the French documents of the high degrees the letters of some words were inverted—not apparently for concealment, but as a mere caprice. Hence Thory (Fondat, p. 128) calls them inversions enfantines (childish inversions). Thus they wrote sioux aroxy for Rosæ crucis. But in all French cahiers and rituals, or, as they call them, tailleurs, words are inverted; that is, the letters are transposed for purposes of secrecy. Thus they would write Nomolos for Solomon, and Marih for Hiram. This was also a custom among the Kabbalists and the Alchemists, to conceal secret words.

Invisibles, Les. (The Invisibles.) A secret order of which little is known. Thory quotes a German writer, who says: "C'est la secte la plus dangereuse; les réceptions des initiés se font la nuit, sous une voûte souterraine, et la doctrine des initiés prêche l'athéisme et le suicide." We need no more upon this subject, and believe the society "sleeps the sleep that knows no waking."

Ionian Islands. Freemasonry appears to have been founded at Corfu, by a Lodge called "Loge de St. Napoléon," under the Grand Orient of France, in 1811.

Iram. (Heb., אֵרָם, aureum excoelsus.) The former ruling Prince of Idumea.

Ischni. (Heb., יִשְׁנִי, salus mea.) One of the five Masters, according to the Masonic myth, appointed by Solomon after the death of Hiram to complete the Temple.

Isiac Table. Known also as the Tabula Isiaca, Mensa Isiaca, and Tabula Bembina. A monument often quoted by archæologists previous to the discovery of hieroglyphics. A flat rectangular bronze plate, inlaid with niello and silver, 56 by 36 inches in size. It consists of three compartments of figures of Egyptian deities and emblems; the central figure is Isis. It was sold by a soldier to a locksmith, bought by Cardinal Bembo in 1527, now in Royal Museum in Turin.

Israfeel. In the Mohammedan faith, the name of the angel who, on the judgment morn, will sound the trumpet of resurrection.

Itratics, Order of. A society of adepts, engaged in the search for the Universal Medicine; is now extinct. Mentioned by Fustier.

I.V.:I.O.:L.: (Inveni Verbum in Ore Leonis.) Initial letters of significant words used in the 13th Degree, A. A. Scottish Rite. They have reference to the recovery of the key of the Sacred Ark, which contains certain treasures. The Ark and its key having been lost in the forest during a battle which occurred when the Jews were journeying through the wilderness, the key was found in the mouth of a lion, who dropped it upon the ground on the approach of the Israelites. Much symbolical teaching is deduced from the historical myth.

Ivory Key. The symbolic jewel of the 4th Degree, A. A. Scottish Rite. On the wards of the key is the Hebrew letter zain.

Izads. The twenty-eight creations of the beneficent deity Ormuzd, or Auramazda, in the Persian religious system.

J.

J. The tenth letter in the English alphabet. It is frequently and interchangeably used with I, and written in Hebrew as Yod (י), with the numerical value of 10, and having reference to the Supreme.

Jaaborou Hammaim. (Heb., יַעֲבֹרֵהֶמַּיִם, aque transibunt.) A word of covered significance in the 15th Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite. It also has reference to the L. D. P. See Liber.

Jabescheh. (Heb., יַבֶּשֶׁה, Earth.) Also written Jebeschah. See I. N. R. I., MACKEY.

Jabulum. A corrupted word used in two of the degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite, the 13th and 17th. The true word and its meaning, however, are disclosed to the initiate.

Jafuhar. The second king in the Scandinavian mysteries. The synonym for Thor.

Jaheb. (Heb., יָהֵב, concedens.) A sacred name used in the 13th Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Jaina Cross. Used by several orders, and found in the abbeys of Great Britain and on the monuments of India. Its significations are many. This cross was adopted by the Jainas, a heterodox sect of the Hindus, who dissent from Brahmanism and deny the Vedas, and whose adherents are found in every province of Upper Hindustan. They are wealthy and influential, and form an important division of the population of India. This symbol is also known as the Fylfot. It is a religious symbol mentioned by Weaver in his Funeral Monuments, by Dr. H. Schliemann as having been found in the presumed ruins of Troy, by De Rossi and others in the Catacombs of Christian Rome, and there termed the Crux dissimulata. It has been found on almost every enduring monument on the globe, of all ages, and in both hemispheres.

Jainas. See above.

James II. and III. of Scotland. See Stuart Masonry, MACKEY.

Jaminim, or Iaminim. (Heb., water.) See I. N. R. I., MACKEY.

Japanese Faith. See Kojiki; also Nihongi.

Jasher, Book of. (Heb., Sepher ha-yashar, The Book of the Upright.) One of the lost books of the ancient Hebrews, which is quoted twice (Josh. x. 13; 2 Sam. i. 18). A Hebrew minstrelsy, recording the warlike deeds of the national heroes, and singing the praises of eminent or celebrated men. An original is said to be in the library at Samarkand.

Jeksan. (Heb., יֶקְסָן.) Name of one of the sons of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2). Used in the 3d Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite. See Jekson, MACKEY.

Jephthah's Daughter. The 1st Degree in the American Order of the Eastern Star, or Adoptive Rite. It inculcates obedience. Color, blue. See Eastern Star, MACKEY.

Jerusalem, Heavenly. The city of God. Mentioned and described in the 19th Degree, A. A. Scottish Rite. Mainly taken from the Apocalypse xxi. 2.

Jesse. A large candlestick, of metal, with many sconces, hanging from the ceiling, and symbolically referring to the Branch of Jesse.

Jetzirah, Sepher, or Book of. (Heb., Book of the Creation.) See Jezirah, MACKEY. A traditional document, said to have been written by the Priest-King Abraham. It has six perakim, or chapters, subdivided into thirty-three mishnas, or sections. The book is intended as a methodical view of the universe. For Sepheroth, see Kabbala, MACKEY.

Jewish Rites and Ceremonies. A period of excitement in favor of the rites of Judaism centred upon and pervaded the people of various nations during the early portion of the fourteenth century. The ceremonies grew and took fast hold upon the minds of the Romans, and, combining with their forms, spread to Constantinople and north-west to Germany and France. The Jewish rites, traditions, and legends thus entered the mystic schools. It was during this period the legend of Hiram first became known (Bro. G. H. Fort), and Jehovah's name, and mystic forms were transmitted from Byzantine workmen to Teutonic sodalities and German guilds. Thus, also, when the Christian enthusiasm pervaded the North, Paganism gave way, and the formal toasts at the ceremonial banquets were drunk in the name of the saints in lieu of those of the Pagan gods.

Jezeeds. A Mohammedan sect in Turkey and Persia, which took its name from the founder, Jezeed, a chief who slew the sons of Ali, the father-in-law of Mohammed. They were ignorant in the extreme, having faith in both the Hebrew Bible and Koran; their hymns were addressed, without distinction, to Moses, Christ, or Mohammed.

Jobel. (Heb., יובל, jubilans.) A name of God used in the Thirteenth Degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Jochebed. (Heb., יוכבד, God-glorified.) The wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron.

Johaben. (Heb., יוהנן; Latin, Filius Dei.) A name of continuous use in the A. A. Scottish Rite, and also mentioned in the Fourth and Fifth Degrees of the modern French Rite.

Joinville, Chaillon de. See Chaillon de Joinville, MACKEY.

Jokshan. (Heb., יקשן, fowler.) The second son of Abraham and Keturah, whose sons appear to be the ancestors of the Sabeans and Dedanites, who inhabited part of Arabia Felix. Same as Jeksan.

Joram. (Heb., יורם, excelsus.) One of three architects sent by Solomon to superintend the cutting and preparing of timber.

Jordan, Karl Stephan. Born 1700, died 1745. Privy Councillor to the King of Prussia, and one of the founders of the Lodge of the Three Globes, at Berlin.

Joshaphat, son of Ahilud. The name of the Orator in the Degree of Provost and Judge, A. A. Scottish Rite.

Jubalcain. Erroneously used for Tubalcain, which see. Jubal was the second son of Lamech by his first wife, Ada, and was the founder of the science of music; while the third son, Tubal Cain, was a famous smithwright.

Jubela-o-m. The mythical names of assassins, the true interpretation of which is only known to the initiate who is an esoteric student.

Judith. (Heb., יהודית.) Used in the French Adoptive Masonry, and in the Fifth Degree of Sov. Illustrious Ecossais.

K.

K. (Heb., כ, Caph, signifying hollow of the hand.) This is the eleventh letter of the English alphabet, and in Hebrew has the numerical value of 20. In the Chaldaic or hieroglyphic it is represented by a hand.

Kabbalistic Companion. A degree found in the archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophical Rite of France.

Kansas. In the year 1855 there were three Lodges in Kansas, holding warrants from the Grand Lodge of Missouri. On November 14, 1855, two of these Lodges met in convention at Leavenworth. In consequence of the absence of the third Lodge, the convention adjourned until December 27, 1855, on which day the two Lodges of Smithton and Leavenworth met, and, Wyandot Lodge being again absent, the delegates of these two Lodges organized the Grand Lodge of Kansas, and elected Richard R. Reece Grand Master.

But these proceedings were considered illegal, in consequence of the convention having been formed by two instead of three Lodges; and, accordingly, another convention of the three chartered Lodges in the Territory was held March 17, 1856, and the proceedings of the previous convention ratified by a re-enactment, the same Grand Master being re-elected.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter was established January 27, 1866.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was organized December 12, 1867.

The Grand Commandery was organized December 29, 1868.

Karmatians. A Mohammedan sect that became notorious from its removal of the celebrated black stone of the Caaba, and, after retaining it for twenty-two years, voluntarily surrendered it. Founded by Karmata at Irak in the ninth century.

Kellermann, Marshal. Duke de Valmy, member of the Supreme Council and Grand Officer of Honor of G. O. of France; elected 1814. Born 1770, died 1835. Served in the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Waterloo.

Kenning's Masonic Cyclopædia. Edited by Rev. A. F. A. Woodford, in London, contemporaneously with the Encyclopædia of Dr. A. G. Mackey, in America, but published subsequently by the well-known Bro. George Kenning, 198 Fleet Street, London, to whom the work is dedicated in affectionate terms. It is with confidence and presumed liberty that we have, on occasion, availed ourself of the views and quoted the language of the Rev. Bro. Woodford. Kenning's Cyclopædia is rendered unusually invaluable in consequence of the fulness of its bibliography. Kloss's well-known Bibliographie der Freimaurer does not become so great a necessity, having Kenning; yet other subjects have not been permitted to suffer in consequence of the numerous short biographic sketches. The work is an admirably-arranged octavo of nearly seven hundred pages.

Kentucky. Organized Freemasonry was introduced by the Grand Lodge of Virginia, which, in the year 1788, granted a charter for Lexington Lodge, No. 25, at Lexington. This was the first Lodge instituted west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Three other Lodges were subsequently chartered by Virginia, namely, at Paris, Georgetown, and Frankford, and a dispensation granted for a fifth at Shelbyville. These five Lodges met in convention at Lexington on September 8, 1800. Having resolved that it was expedient to organize a Grand Lodge, and prepared an address to the Grand Lodge of Virginia, the convention adjourned to October 16th. On that day it reassembled and organized the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, William Murray being elected Grand Master.

Chapters of Royal Arch Masons, independent of the Grand Lodge, were first established by Thomas Smith Webb in 1816, and the Grand Chapter was formed December 4, 1817.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters was organized December 10, 1827.

The Grand Encampment (now the Grand Commandery) was organized October 5, 1847.

Scottish Masonry was introduced into Kentucky, and the Grand Consistory organized at Louisville, in August, 1852, by Bro. Albert G. Mackey, Secretary-General of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction.

Khem. The Egyptian Deity, Amon, in the position metaphorically used in representations of Buddha and by the Hermetic philosophers, one hand toward Heaven and the other toward Nature.

Khepra. An Egyptian Deity, presiding over transformation, and represented with the beetle in place of a head.

Kher-heb. The Master of Ceremonies in the Egyptian system of worship.

Khesvan or Chesvan. (כֶּסְבָּן.) The same Hebrew month as Marchesvan, which

see. Under the title Marchesvan, there is an error in the statement that it begins in November. It does sometimes, but more usually with October, and therefore corresponds to October and November.

Khetem el Nabiim. Mohammed, the seal of the prophets.

Khon. The title given to the dead, subject to examination as depicted in ch. 125 of the Book of the Dead in the Egyptian Ritual.

Khotbah. The Confession of Faith under the Mohammedan law.

Khurum-Abi. A variation of the name of Hiram Abi.

Ki. A word used in the old Ritual of the Eighth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

King of the Sanctuary. A side degree formerly conferred in the presence of five Past Masters, now in disuse.

King of the World. A degree in the system of the Philosophical Rite.

Kings, The Five. The sacred code of the older Chinese. The word king signifies web of cloth, or the warp that keeps the threads in position, or upon which we may weave the sombre and golden colors that make up this life's pictured history. This great light in Chinese secret societies contains the best sayings of the best sages on the ethico-political duties of life. They cannot be traced to a period beyond the tenth century B. C., although the religion is believed to be older.

Some of the superior classes of Chinese are believers in the great philosopher Lao-tse, and others in the doctrines of Confucius. The two religions appear to be twin in age, not strikingly dissimilar, and each has been given a personality in color in accordance with the character of ethics believed in by the two writers. Lao-tse and Confucius were the revivers of an older religion, the former of whom was born 604 B. C., and the latter fifty-four years subsequently.

The five kings are, the Yih-King, or Book of Changes; the Shi-King, or Book of Songs; the Shu-King, or Book of Annals; the Ch'un Ts'iu, or "Spring and Autumn;" and the Li-King, or Book of Rites. The fourth book was composed by Confucius himself, while the first three are supposed to have been compiled by him, and the fifth by his disciples from his teachings.

Dr. Legge, Prof. of Chinese Classics at Oxford, England, and Dr. Medhurst assert that there are no authentic records in China earlier than 1100 B. C., and no alphabetical writing 1500 B. C.

The grandeur of the utterances and brilliancy of the intellectual productions of Confucius and Mencius, as law-givers and expounders of the sacred code of the Chinese, called The Five Kings, are much to be admired, and are the trestle-board of fully 80,000,000 of the earth's population.

Kislev or Chislev. (1755.) The third month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding with the months November and December, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Knewt-neb-s. The Egyptian goddess personifying the West, facing the East.

Knife and Fork Degree. Those Masons who take more delight in the refreshments of the banquet than in the labors of the Lodge, and who admire Masonry only for its social aspect, are ironically said to be "Members of the Knife and Fork Degree."

The sarcasm was first uttered by Dermott, when he said in his Ahiman Rezon, p. 36, speaking of the Moderns, that "it was also thought expedient to abolish the old custom of studying geometry in the Lodge; and some of the young brethren made it appear that a good knife and fork in the hands of a dexterous brother, over proper materials, would give greater satisfaction and add more to the rotundity of the Lodge than the best scale and compass in Europe."

Knight Evangelist. A grade formerly in the archives of the Lodge of "St. Louis des Amis Reunis," at Calais.

Knights of St. John the Evangelist of Asia in Europe. Founded at Schleswig and Hamburg by Count of Ecker and Eckhoffen, in 1786, out of his Order of the "True Light," founded the previous year.

Knights of the True Light. A degree founded by Count of Ecker and Eckhoffen, in 1785.

Knocks, Three. When the Craft were to be called to labor in old North Germany, "the Master should give three knocks, a Pallirer two, consecutively; and in case the Craft at large were imperatively demanded, one blow must be struck, morning, midday, or at eventide." (Ordnung der Steinmetzen, 1462, Art. 28.) Fort, in his Early History, etc., says, "three strokes by a Master convened all the members of that degree; two strokes by the Pallirer called the Fellows, and by a single blow each member was assembled in Lodge. In the opening and closing of Teutonic tribunals of justice, the judge carried a staff or mace, as an emblem of jurisdiction, and order was enjoined by a blow on the pedestal by the Arbiter."

Kenning mentions an exposition of Masonry, known as "Three Distinct Knocks," purporting to have been republished in 1767, by H. Sergeant, Without Temple Bar. Dermott says Daniel Tadpole was the editor.

Kojiki. (Book of Ancient Traditions.) The oldest monument of Sintonism, the ancient religion of Japan. It is written in pure Japanese, and was composed by order of the Mikado Gemmio, A. D. 712, and first printed about 1625. The adherents of Sintonism number about 14,000,000.

Korah. Was the son of Izhar, uncle of Moses, and famed for beauty and wealth. It is related that he refused to give alms, as Moses had commanded, and brought a villanous charge against Moses, who complained thereof to God; the answer was that the earth would obey whatever command he should give; and Moses said, "O earth, swallow them up;" then Korah and his confederates were sinking into the ground, when Korah pleaded for mercy, which Moses refused. Then God said, "Moses, thou hadst no mercy on Korah, though he asked pardon of thee four times; but I would have had compassion on him if he had asked pardon of me but once."—Al Beidawi.

Koran or Al Coran. (The Reading.) The book of faith of the Mohammedans, or of about one-eighth of the human race. It is a single volume of 114 chapters of very unequal length, written in Arabic, and containing the doctrines and pretended revelations of Mohammed, "The Prophet," whose followers number over 180,000,000.

Krause Manuscript. A title sometimes given to the so-called York Constitutions, a German translation of which was published by Krause, in 1810, in his Kunst-erkunden. See York Constitutions, in the body of this work.

Krishna or Christna. One of the Trimurti in the Hindu religious system. The myth proceeds to state that Devanaguy, upon the appearance of Vishnu, fell in a profound ecstasy, and having been overshadowed (Sanskrit), the spirit was incarnated, and upon the birth of a child, the Virgin and Son were conducted to a sheepfold belonging to Nanda, on the confines of the territory of Madura. The newly born was named Krishna (in Sanskrit, sacred). The Rajah of Madura had been informed in a dream that this son of Devanaguy should dethrone and chastise him for all his crimes; he therefore sought the certain destruction of the child, and ordained the massacre, in all his states, of all the children of the male sex born during the night of the birth of Krishna. A troop of soldiers reached the sheepfold of Nanda, the lord of a small village on the banks of the Ganges, and celebrated for his virtues. The servants were about to arm in defence, when the child, who was at his mother's breast, suddenly grew to the appearance and size of a child ten years of age, and running, amused himself amidst the flock of sheep. The exploits of this wonder child, his preaching the new or reformed doctrine of India, his disciples and loved companion Ardjouna, the parables, philosophic teaching, the myth of his transfiguration, his ablutions in the Ganges before his death, and tragic end, together with the story of his revival after three days, and ascension, are graphically told by many authors, perhaps more brilliantly in La Bible dans l'Inde, as translated into English by Louis Jacolliot.

Kulma. The Hindustani Confession of Faith.

Kun. Arabic for Be, the creative fiat of God.

L.

L. (Heb., ל; Samaritan, 𐤋.) The shape of the twelfth English letter is borrowed from that of the Oriental lomad, coinciding with the Samaritan. The numerical value in Hebrew is thirty. The Roman numeral L is fifty. Hebrew name of Deity, as an equivalent, is למר, Limmud, or Doctus. This letter also signifies a stimulus, generally female.

Laanah. (Heb., לענה.) Wormwood, a word used in the Order of Ishmael.

Labady. A member of the G. Loge de France, banished, in 1766, for alleged libel. An exile to Blois, in Oct., 1767, for permitting Masonic assemblies at his residence contrary to the orders of the government.

Laboratory. The place where experiments in chemistry, pharmacy, etc., are performed; the workroom of the chemist. An important apartment in the conferring of the degrees of the Society of Rosicrucians.

Labrum. From the Latin. A lip or edge, as of a dish or font; having reference to the vase at the entrance of places of worship for preliminary lustration.

Labyrinth. A place full of intricacies, with winding passages, as the Egyptian, Samian, and Cretan labyrinths. That of the Egyptians was near Lake Moeris, which contained twelve palaces under one roof, and was of polished stone, with many vaulted passages, and a court of 3000 chambers, half under the earth and half above them. Pliny states it was 3600 years old in his day. The labyrinth is symbolical of the vicissitudes and anxieties of life, and is thus metaphorically used in a number of the degrees of various Rites. Sage of the Labyrinth is the eighteenth grade, Rite of Memphis, in the Order of 1860. Sage Sublime of Labyrinth, the fifty-fifth grade of the same organization. See Catacombs.

Lacépède, B. G. E. de la Ville.

A French savant and naturalist, born in 1756, died 1825. President of the Legislative Assembly in 1791. Master of the Lodge "De St. Napoléon" in 1805. An account of his installation is recorded by Kloss.

Lakak Deror Pessah. (Hebrew, לקח דרור פסח.) The initials of these three words are found on the symbol of the Bridge in the Fifteenth Degree of the Scottish Rite, signifying liberty of passage and liberty of thought. See Bridge, also Liber.

Lamaism. The name of the religion prevalent in Tibet and Mongolia. (Tibet, Llama, pronounced lama, a chief or high priest.) Buddhism, corrupted by Sivaism, an adoration of saints. At the summit of its hierarchy are two Lama popes, having equal rank and authority in spiritual and temporal affairs.

Lamballe, The Princess of. Niece of Marie Antoinette, murdered in 1792 at Paris. The Grand Mistress of the so-called Mother Lodge of "La Maçonnerie d'Adoption."

Lamma Sabactani. An expression used in the Masonic French Rite of Adoption.

Lamp, Knight of the Inextinguishable. A degree so designated by Fustier and Thory.

Lance. A weapon for thrusting at an enemy, usually adorned with a small flag, made of tough ash, weighted at one end, and pointed at the other.

Langes, Savalette de. The Master of "Les Amis Réunis," who aided in founding the system of Philaletes in 1775.

Lansdowne MS. This version of the "Old Charges" is of very early date; about the middle or latter half of the sixteenth century, as these "Free Masons Orders and Constitutions" are believed to have been part of the collection made by Lord Burghley (Sec. of State, temp. Edward VI.), who died A. D. 1598.

Brother Gould, in his History (vol. i., p. 61), says the "MS. is contained on the inner side of three sheets and a half of stout paper, eleven by fifteen inches, making in all seven folios, many of the principal words being in large letters of an ornamental character. Mr. Sims (MS. Department of the British Museum) does not consider these 'Orders' ever formed a roll, though there are indications of the sheets having been stitched together at the top, and paper or vellum was used for additional protection. It has evidently 'seen service.' It was published in Freemasons' Mag., February 24, 1858, and Hughan's Old Charges (p. 31). The catalogue of the Lansdowne MSS.—which consisted of twelve hundred and forty-five volumes, bought by Parliament, in 1807, for £4925—has the following note on the contents of this document: 'No. 48. A very foolish legendary account of the original of the Order of Freemasonry'—in the handwriting, it is said, of Sir Henry Ellis."

Lanturelus, Ordredes. Instituted, according to Clavel, in 1771 by the Marquis de Croismare. Its purposes or objects are not now understood.

La Rochefoucault, Bayers, Le Marquis de. G. Master of the "Rite Ecossais Philosophique" in 1776. A Mason of considerable note.

Lasalle, Troubat de. One of the founders of the Mother Lodge of the "Rite Ecossais Philosophique."

Lateran Councils. They were five in number, regarded as ecumenical, and were held in the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome, in 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512.

Latour d'Auvergne, Le Prince de. President of the Mother Lodge of the "Rite Ecossais Philosophique" in 1805, and member of the Grand Orient of France in 1814.

Laver, Brazen. A large brazen vessel for washing placed in the court of the Jewish tabernacle, where the officiating priest cleansed his hands and feet, and as well the entrails of victims. Constructed by command of Moses (Exod. xxxviii. 8). A similar vessel was symbolically used at the entrance, in the modern French and Scotch Rites, when conferring the Apprentice Degree. It is used in many of the degrees of the latter Rite.

Lawful Information. See Vouching, MACKEY.

Law, Sacred. The Sacred Scriptures, the Bible, the Great Light in Masonry.

Lay Brothers. A society founded in the eleventh century, consisting of two classes, who were skilled in architecture; also recognized as a degree in the Rite of Strict Observance.

Lazarus, Order of. An order instituted in Palestine, termed the "United Order of St. Lazarus and of our Beloved Lady of Mount Carmel." It was a military order engaged against the Saracens, by whom it was nearly destroyed. In 1150 the knights assumed the vows of Obedience, Poverty, and Chastity, in the presence of William the Patriarch. In 1572, Gregory XII. united the Italian knights of the order with that of St. Maurice. Vincent de Paul, in 1617, founded a religious order, which was approved in 1626, and erected into a congregation in 1632, and so called from the priory of St. Lazarus in Paris, which was occupied by the order during the French revolution. The members are called Priests of the Mission, and are employed in teaching and missionary labors.

Lemierre, A. M. Born in 1733, died in 1793. A writer of merit who belonged to the "Neuf Sœurs," and was present at the reception of Voltaire.

Lenning, C. The assumed name of a learned German Mason, who resided at Paris in 1817, where Krause speaks of him as an estimable man and well-informed Freemason. He was the first projector of the Encyclopædie der Freimaurerei, which Findel justly calls "one of the most learned and remarkable works in Masonic literature." The manuscript coming into the possession of the Leipsic bookseller, Brockhaus, he engaged Friedrich Mossdorf to edit it. He added so much to the original, revising and amplifying all the most important articles and adding many new ones, that Kloss catalogues it in his Bibliographie as the work of Mossdorf. The Encyclopædie is in three volumes, of which the first was published in 1822, the second in 1825, and the third in 1828. A second edition, under the title of Handbuch der Freimaurerei, was published under the editorship of Schletter and Zille.—MACKEY.

Leontica. Ancient sacrificial festivals in honor of the sun; the officiating priests being termed Leontes.

Leo XII., Pope. Born in 1760, died in 1829. On the 12th of April, 1826, he issued the well-remembered bull, beginning "Quo graviora mala," against the Freemasons.

Lesser Lights. The custom prevalent in some localities, of placing the burning tapers, or three symbolic lesser lights, east, west, and south, near the altar, is sometimes changed so that these respective lights are burning on the pedestals of the Master and his two Wardens at their several stations. In the old Teutonic mythology, and in accordance with mediæval court usage, flaming lights or fires burned before each column, similarly situated, on which rested the image of Odin, Thor, and Frey. These columns are further represented as Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty, sustaining the "Starry-decked Heaven," roof or ceiling colored blue, with stars.

Levit, Der. The Levite was the fourth grade of the Order of the Knights of the True Light.

Liber. Liberty. Of which the eagle, in the Rose Croix degree, is symbolical. Liberty of thought, speech, and action, within the bounds of civil, political, and conscientious law, without license. A book, and hence the word library, or collection of books. It was also one of the names of the god Bacchus. The freedom which knowledge confers. Liber, the bark, or inner rind of a tree, on which books were originally written; hence, leaves of a book and leaves of a tree; or, similarly in Latin, folio of a book, the foliage of a tree. Thus, the "tree of knowledge" becomes the "book of wisdom;" the "tree of life" becomes the "book of life." See Lakak Deror Pessah, Add., and Libertas, MACKEY. The Bridge mentioned in the Sixteenth Degree, Scottish Rite, has the initials of Liberty of Passage over its arches.

Liberté, Ordre de la. (Order of Liberty.) A French androgyn Order, instituted in Paris, 1744, and the precursor of "La Maçonnerie d'Adoption."

"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." The motto of the French Freemasons.

Libyan, or Lybic Chain. The Eighty-fifth grade of the Rite of Memphis; old style.

Licht, Ritter von Wahren. Knight of the True Light, presumed to have been founded in Austria, in 1780, by Hans Heinrich Freiherr von Ecker and Eckhoffen. It consisted of five grades.

Lichtseher, Oder Erleuchtete. (The Enlightened.) A mystical sect established at Schlettstadt by Küper Martin Steinbach, in the sixteenth century. Mentioned in the "Handbuch," in 1566, by Pastor Reinhard Lutz. It delved in Scriptural interpretation.

Lilis, or Lilith. In the popular belief of the Hebrews, a female spectre, in elegant attire, who secretly destroys children. The fabled wife of Adam, before he married Eve, by whom he begat devils.

Lily of the Valley. A side degree in the Templar system of France.

Lion, Chevalier du. (Knight of the Lion.) The twentieth grade of the third series of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

Lion of the Tribe of Judah. See Tribe of Judah, Lion of the, MACKEY.

Livre d'Architecture. The French designation of the book of minutes.

Livre d'Eloquence. A French expression for a collection of minutes of addresses made in a Lodge.

Loki. See Balder.

Louis Napoleon. Second Adjoint of the Grand Master of the G. Orient of France. Nominated, in 1806, king of Holland. Louis Napoleon III. was widely known as an interested Mason.

Ludewig, H. E. An energetic Mason, born in 1810, in Germany; died in 1856, in America. By "powers from home" this ardent brother attempted to set up an independent authority to the existing Grand Lodge system in the United States; but, like many such attempts, it flashed brilliantly for a season, but proved of ephemeral nature.

Luffon. One of the French terms for Louveteau, or Lewis, which see, MACKEY.

Lully, Raymond. A celebrated chemist and philosopher, the seneschal of Majorca, surnamed le docteur illumine. His discoveries are most noted, such as the mode of rectifying spirits, the refining of silver, etc. He was born about 1234. In 1276 he founded a college of Franciscans at Palma, for instruction in Eastern lore, and especially the study of the Arabic language, for which purpose he instituted several colleges between the years 1293 and 1311. He died in 1314. He is known as an eminent Rosicrucian, and many fables as to his longevity are related of him.

Lumiere, La Grande. (The Grand Light.) A grade in the collection of Brother Viany.

Lumiere, La Vraie. (The True Light, or Perfect Mason.) Originally, according to Thory, part of the system of the Royal York at Berlin.

Lunus. An Egyptian deity, known as Khons Lunus, and represented as hawk-headed, surmounted by the crescent and disc. When appearing with the head of an ibis, he is called Thoth-Lunus. His worship was very extensive through ancient Egypt, where he was known as Aah, who presides over rejuvenation and resurrection. Champollion mentions in his Pantheon a Lunus bifrons.

Luz. An ever-living power, according to the old Jewish rabbins, residing in a small joint-bone existing at the base of the spinal column. To this undying principle, watered by the dew of heaven, is ascribed the immortality in man.

"R. Joshua Ben Hananiah replied to Hadrian, as to how man revived in the world to come, 'From Luz, in the backbone.' When asked to demonstrate this, he took Luz, a little bone out of the backbone, and put it in water, and it was not steeped; he put it in the fire, and it was not burned; he brought it to the mill, and that could not grind it; he laid it on the anvil, and knocked it with a hammer, but the anvil was cleft, and the hammer broken."

Lyon, David Murray. While this encyclopædia is not intended as a biographical sketch book, yet there are Masons so prominent in its literature, and enjoying so large a share of the affection of their brethren, that some space is gladly accorded to a well-spring of memory. Such is David Murray Lyon, of whom A. F. A. Woodford speaks none too highly in that most admirable work, known the world over as Kenning's Cyclopædia of Freemason- ry. We take none too much liberty in making abstracts.

"Bro. D. Murray Lyon is, without doubt, the foremost Masonic student of Scotland, either of this or any other period; and the results of his continuous and arduous researches are to be found in all the books and periodicals of the Craft for the last twenty years, both at home and abroad. It is simply impossible to furnish anything like an accurate and complete list of his many valuable contributions which have adorned Masonic magazines from the time of his initiation in the Lodge Ayr, St. Paul, No. 204, Scotland, in 1856. . . . His chief works have been the History of the Mother Lodge Kilwinning, Scotland, the History of the Old Lodge at Thornhill, and, finally, the History of the Ancient Lodge at Edinburgh (Mary's Chapel), from the sixteenth century. This grand work, a most massive and splendid volume, has placed Bro. Lyon in the front rank of Masonic authors. . . . Bro. Lyon enjoys the confidence and the esteem of the Craft in Europe and America, and all delight to honor one so worthy, in every sense, of their regard."

M.

M. (Heb., מ, Mem), which signifies water in motion, having for its hieroglyph a waving line, referring to the surface of the water. As a numeral, M stands for 1000. In Hebrew its numerical value is 40. The sacred name of Deity, applied to this letter, is מבורך, Meborach, Benedictus.

Mackenzie, Kenneth R. H. ("Cryptonymus.") Editor of The Royal Masonic Cyclopædia of History, Rites, Symbolism, and Biography, containing upwards of 3000 subjects, together with numerous original archaeological articles on topics never before treated in any similar work; published in London by Bro. John Hogg, Paternoster Row. This admirable and standard work of nearly 800 pages, octavo, is replete with that useful information so necessary to the neophyte or the student in Masonry. The thorough examination of the work incident to this present compilation has further convinced the writer of its extreme value. The liberty of quoting at times direct from The Royal Masonic Cyclopædia is hereby acknowledged, as is further mentioned in treating on various subjects herein. The treatises on "Rosicrucian-ism," and the "Kabbalah," are especially commendable; in fact they, with numbers of others, may be termed complete systematic expositions. Bro. Mackenzie is an Honorary Member of the Canongate Kilwinning Lodge, No. 2, Scotland, and a Magus, IX., in the modern Rosicrucian system.

Maçon. The liberty is herein taken of giving from Rev. A. F. A. Woodford, editor of Kenning's Cyclopædia, London, Eng., the derivation of this word, thus: "The Norman-French word for 'mason'—as the operative mason in early days was called 'le maçon,' and this was corrupted into maccon, maccouyn, masoun, masouyn, mesouyn, and even maeon. The word seems to come from 'maçonner,' which had both its operative meaning and derivative meaning of conspiring, in 1238, and which again comes from 'mansio,' a word of classic use. Some writers have derived the word 'maçon' from maison; but though 'maisonner' and maçonner appear eventually to be equivalent to 'mansionem facere,' in its first meaning, 'maison' seems to be simply a wooden house, as 'maisonage' is defined by Roquefort to be 'Bois de charpente propre à bâtir les maisons,' and then he adds, 'C'est aussi l'action de bâtir.' Roquefort seems to prefer to derive 'maisonner' from the Low Latin verb 'mansionare.' Be this as it may, we have in the word maçon, as it appears to us, a clear evidence of the development of the operative guilds through the Norman-French artificers of the Conquest, who carried the operative guilds, as it were, back to Latin terminology, and to a Roman origin." See Mason, MACKEY.

Maçon dans la Voie Droite. (The Mason in the Right Way.) The second grade of the system of Avignon.

Maçon du Secret. (The Mason of the Secret.) The sixth grade of the reformed rite of Baron Tschoudy, and the seventh in the reformed rite of St. Martin. —THORY.

Maçon, Ecossais, Maître. See Mason, Scottish Master, MACKEY.

Maçonne Maîtresse. Third grade of the Maçonnerie d'Adoption.

Maçonnerie Rouge. (Red Freemasonry.) The designation of the four high grades of the French Rite. Bazot says that the name comes from the color worn in the fourth grade.

Maçonnieke Societeiten. Dutch Masonic Clubs, somewhat like unto the English Lodges of Instruction, with more, perhaps, of the character of a club. Kenning's Cyclopædia says "there were about nineteen of these associations in the principal towns of Holland in 1860."

"Macoy's Cyclopaedia." "A General History, Cyclopaedia, and Dictionary of Freemasonry," containing some 300 engravings, by Robert Macoy, 33^d, published in New York, which has passed through a number of editions. It was originally founded on A Dictionary of Symbolical Masonry, by George Oliver, D.D. Bro. Macoy has occupied the prominent position of Deputy G. Master of the G. Lodge of New York, and is, and has been for a series of years, the G. Recorder of the State G. Commandery of the Order of the Temple, K. T.

Macrocosm. (μακρὸς κόσμος, the great world.) The visible system of worlds; the outer world or universe. It is opposed to Microcosm, the little world, as in man. It has been used as the Macric soul in opposition to the Micric animal life, and as the soul of the universe as opposed to the soul of a single world or being. A subject of much note to the Rosicrucians in the study of the Mysterium Magnum.

Magazine. Mackey says the earliest Masonic magazine was the Freimaurer Zeitung, issued in Berlin in 1783, but the Rev. Bro. Woodford, of London, Eng., who has had later search, states that the earliest was Der Freymaurer, published in 1738, by Bernhard Christoph Breitkopf, at Leipzig, of which he has a copy, and was followed in 1742 by Der bedachtige Freimaurer, Hamburg, by Tr. Fr. Tentzel, 1742. In 1743 the Aufmerksame Freimaurer appeared at Gorlitz, and subsequently several others, purely Masonic, all mentioned by Kloss. Many new Masonic journals, also, beginning with the Neue europäische Fama, in 1731, and Des europäischen Staats Secretär, in 1740, contained articles relating to Freemasonry. In England the first Masonic magazine was of 1793. Although we had no English Masonic journal to boast of, many of the London papers alluded to Freemasonry, such as the St. James' Evening Post, quoted lately by Bro. W. J. Hughan, so early, too, as 1734; and probably later "excerpta" relating to Freemasonry may be discovered. The first official calendar, as we have said before, in England was 1777. In France the first official journal seems to have been Etat du Grand Orient de France, in 1778; while the Etranges Intéressantes were published in 1797. There is, however, in the St. James' Evening Post, dated from Paris, January 2, 1738, reprinted what is the Paris letter, first published, we believe, in the so-called Secrets of Masonry, by S. P., London, 1737, as Bro. Hughan points out, and which is also dated Paris, January 13, 1737. How far this is original or fictitious is not now very easy to say. On this subject, Bro. Woodford pays a handsome compliment to the American literary Masons in these words, which we heartily endorse: "We ought never, it appears to us, to forget the great debt of gratitude which Masonic students owe to many admirable Masonic magazines in the United States, which had not the success they deserved, though many have flourished and are still to the fore, and to their accomplished editors. Among these may be fairly mentioned C. W. Moore, Dr. A. G. Mackey, Bros. Hynemann, Brown, Morris, Bailey, Gouley, C. Moore, cum multis aliis." We designate specially two now at the meridian of literary genius—The Voice of Masonry, by John W. Brown, of Chicago, editor and publisher, and The Freemason's Repository, now in its 13th volume, edited by Henry W. Rugg, of Providence, R. I.

Magi, The Three. The "Wise men of the East" who came to Jerusalem, bringing gifts to the infant Jesus. The traditional names of the three are Melchior, an old man, with a long beard, offering gold; Jasper, a beardless youth, who offers frankincense; Balthazar, a black or Moor, with a large spreading beard, who tenders myrrh. The patron saints of travellers. "Tradition fixed their number at three, probably in allusion to the three races springing from the sons of Noah. The Empress Helena caused their corpses to be transported to Milan from Constantinople. Frederick Barbarossa carried them to Cologne, the place of their special glory as the Three Kings of Cologne."—YONGE. Magi is the title of the three principal officers ruling the society of the Rosicrucians.

Magna est veritas et prævalet. (The truth is great, and it will prevail.) The motto of the Red Cross degree, or Knights of the Red Cross.

Magnan, B. P. A marshal of France, nominated by Napoleon III., emperor, as Grand Master of the Grand Orient of France, in 1862, and, though not a member of the great fraternity at the time, was initiated and installed Grand Master, February 8, 1862, and so remained until May 29, 1865.

Mahabharata. A Sanskrit poem, recounting the rivalries of the descendants of King Bharata, and occupying a place among the Shasters of the Hindus. It contains many thousand verses, written at various unknown periods since the completion of the Ramayana.

Mahadeva. ("The great god.") One of the common names by which the Hindu god Siva is called. His consort, Durgā, is similarly styled Mahādevi (the great goddess). In Buddhistic history, Mahadeva, who lived two hundred years after the death of the Buddha Sakyamuni, or 343, is a renowned teacher who caused a schism in the Buddhistic Church.

Mahakasyapa. The renowned disciple of Buddha Sakyamuni, who arranged the metaphysical portion of the sacred writings called Abhidharma.

Malcolm III. (King of Scotland.) Reported to have chartered the Lodge "St. John of Glasgow" in the year 1057.

Man, or Perfected Creation. The symbol representing perfected creation, which is "very common on ancient Hindu monuments in China," embraces so many of the Masonic emblems, and so directly refers to several of the elementary principles taught in philosophic Masonry, that it is here introduced with its explanations. Forlong, in his Faiths of Man, gives this arrangement:

A—is the Earth, or foundation on which all build.

Wa—Water, as in an egg, or as condensed fire and ether.

Ra—Fire, or the elements in motion.

Ka—Air, or wind—Juno, or Io ni; a condensed element.

Cha—Ether, or Heaven, the cosmical Former.

This figure is frequently found in India:

Ether, or Heaven,

Air,

Fire,

Water,

Earth.

As these symbols are readily interpretable by those conversant with Masonic hieroglyphs, it may be seen that the elements, in their ascending scale, show the perfected creation. Forlong remarks that "as it was difficult to show the All-pervading Ether, Egypt, for this purpose, surrounded her figures with a powder of stars instead of flame, which on Indra's garments were Yonis. This figure gradually developed, becoming in time a very concrete man, standing on two legs instead of a square base,—the horns of the crescent (Air), being outstretched, formed the arms, and the refulgent Flame the head, which, with the Greeks and Romans, represented the sun, or Fire, and gives Light to all. To this being, it was claimed, there were given seven senses; and thus, perfect and erect, stood Man, rising above the animal state."

The seven senses were seeing, hearing, tasting, feeling, smelling, understanding, and speech. See Ecclesiasticus xvii. 5:

"The Lord created man, and they received the use of the five operations of the Lord; and in the sixth place he imparted (to) them understanding, and in the seventh speech, an interpreter of the cogitations thereof."

The words "seven senses" also occur in the poem of Taliesin, called "Y Bid Mawr, or the Macrocosm" (Brit. Mag., vol. 21, p. 30). See further the "Mysterium Magnum" of Jacob Boehmen, which teaches "how the soul of man, or his inward holy body," was compounded of the seven properties under the influence of the seven planets:

"I will adore my Father,
My God, my Supporter,
Who placed, throughout my head,
The soul of my reason,
And made for my perception
My seven faculties
Of Fire, and Earth, and Water, and Air,
And mist, and flowers,
And the southerly wind,
As it were seven senses of reason
For my Father to impel me:
With the first I shall be animated,

With the second I shall touch,
 With the third I shall cry out,
 With the fourth I shall taste,
 With the fifth I shall see,
 With the sixth I shall hear,
 With the seventh I shall smell."

Mango. The branches of this tree are a prominent feature in all Eastern religious ceremonies. The mango is the apple-tree of India, with which man, in Indian tale, tempted Eve.

Manichæans. (Also termed Gnostics.) A sect taking its rise in the middle of the third century, whose belief was in two eternal principles of good and evil. They derived their name from Manes, a philosopher of Persian birth, sometimes called Manichæus. Of the two principles, Ormuzd was the author of the good, while Ahriman was the master spirit of evil. The two classes of neophytes were, the true, siddi kûn; the listeners, samma un.

Manichiens, Les Freres. A secret Italian society, founded, according to Thory and Clavel, in the eighteenth century, at which the doctrines of Manes were set forth in several grades.

Mann, Der. The Man, the second grade of the "Deutsche Union."

Manu. By reference to the Book of the Dead, it will be found that this word covers an ideal space corresponding to the word west, in whose bosom is received the setting sun. Also see Truth.

Manuscripts, Apocryphal. Having great reliance on the critical ability and the excellent judgment of Bro. Robert Freke Gould, of England, it is well to quote the result of his examination of certain manuscripts that have been accepted by many in the past as without question. By reference to page 634, ante, of this work, a schedule of 37 manuscripts will be found. No. 36 is the Leland-Locke Manuscript, of 1753. It is the first of six documents falling within the category of apocryphal MSS. mentioned by Bro. Gould. It was also deemed apocryphal by Dr. Mackey. (See Leland MS.) Bro. Gould says: "It remains to be noticed, that among the Masonic annalists of our own day, there yet lingers a solitary believer in the credibility of this MS," and then quotes Bro. Fort. The second is The Steinmetz Catechism, or the Entered Apprentice's Lecture—an eighteenth century—one of the Krause manuscripts—Dr. Mackey's No. 34. The argument is full as to the non-authenticity of the document, and reference should be had to Bro. Gould's History, pp. 489-92. The third is the Malcolm Canmore Charter, which came to light in 1806, consequent upon the "claim of the Glasgow Freemen Operative St. John's Lodge" to take precedence of the other Lodges in the Masonic procession, at the laying of the foundation-stone of Nelson's monument on 'Glasgow Green,' although at that time it was an independent organization." The controversy as to this old (?) document was lively, but finally it was pronounced to be a manufactured parchment, and the Grand Lodge of Scotland declined to recognize it of value. The fourth MS. is that of Krause, known as Prince Edwin's Constitution of 926. Upon this unquestioned reliance had for decades been placed, then it came to be doubted, and is now little credited by inquiring Masons. Bro. Gould closes his recital of criticisms with the remark: "The original document, as commonly happens in forgeries of this description, is missing; and how, under all the circumstances of the case, Krause could have constituted himself the champion of its authenticity, it is difficult to conjecture. Possibly, however, the explanation may be, that in impostures of this character, credulity, on the one part, is a strong temptation to deceit on the other, especially to deceit of which no personal injury is the consequence, and which flatters the student of old documents with his own ingenuity." These remarks are specially quoted as relating to almost all apocryphal documents. The fifth, the Charter of Cologne, is the 37th manuscript mentioned in Dr. Mackey's schedule (see p. 634, also p. 173), and was believed by him to be of no authentic value. Bro. Gould cites Bobrik and Dr. Schwetschke as careful and decisive examiners who have pronounced against the genuineness of the MS. The sixth, the Larmenius Charter, or the Charter of Transmission, is that "upon which rests the claims of the Order of the Temple to being the lineal successors of the historic Knights Templars, which was not published until between 1804 and 1810, and its earlier history, if indeed it has one, is so tainted with imposture, as to remove any possibility of unravelling the tangled web of falsehood in which the whole question is enveloped." The argument following is voluminous, and Bro. Gould's History should be consulted.

Manuscripts, Old. As a matter of the first importance to students of the origin and history of Freemasonry, there is herein given, in sequence of age, the old records or MSS., so far as they have been unearthed and classified; they all relate to the old charges of British Freemasons. The following synoptical list is made up from Bro. Robert Freke Gould's History, vol. i., p. 60-106.

1. "Halliwell," fourteenth century. Brit. Museum (Bib. Reg. 17 A 1). Early History of Freemasonry in England, by J. O. Halliwell, Esq., F. R. S., London, 1840, etc. MS. on vellum 5 x 4 inches, bound in Russia, having thereon G. R. 11, 1757, and the royal arms. Mr. Halliwell (Phillips) states, "this is the earliest document yet brought to light connected with the progress of Freemasonry in Great Britain." Casley ascribes it to the fourteenth century, and Kloss as between 1427 and 1445.

2. "Cooke," fifteenth century. Brit. Museum (Addl. MSS. 23,198). Published in London, 1861, and edited by Mr. Matthew Cooke, hence its title. Mr. Bond's estimate is early fifteenth century. (See Cooke's MSS., by Mackey.) Wooden cover, vellum sheets connected with twine, size of No. 1.

3. "Lansdowne," sixteenth century. B. Museum (No. 98, art. 48). Published by W. James Hughan, in his Old Charges, p. 31. Mr. Bond places the date at 1600, others earlier. The MS. is on the inner sides of 3½ sheets stout paper 11 x 15 inches, making seven folios.

4. "Grand Lodge," 1583. G. Lodge of England. First published by Hughan in Old Charges. A parchment roll 9 feet long, 5 inches wide. Date, Dec. 25, 1583.

5. "York, No. 1," seventeenth century. The York Lodge, No. 236, York. A parchment roll, 7 feet by 5 inches, containing the constitutions of Masonry.

6 and 7. "Wilson, Nos. 1 and 2," seventeenth century. Thirlestane House, Cheltenham. Published in Masonic Magazine, 1876. The MSS. are on vellum, and by Rev. A. F. A. Woodford deemed to be of sixteenth century.

8. "Inigo Jones," 1607. Rev. A. F. A. Woodford. Published in Masonic Magazine, July, 1881. A folio MS., with ornamented title and drawing.

9. "Wood," 1610. Rev. A. F. A. Woodford. Published in Masonic Magazine, June, 1881. On vellum, with illuminated letters scattered throughout. Like No. 8, it refers to the old "Constitutions of Masonry."

10. "York, No. 3," 1630. At York, 1779. A parchment roll of "Charges on Masonry."

11. "Harleian, 1942," seventeenth century. B. Museum. Published in part in Freemasons' Quarterly Review, 1836, also in Hughan's Old Charges. The MS. contains "The New Articles." Of age, early seventeenth century.

12. "Harleian, 2054," seventeenth century. B. Museum. "A book in folio, containing many tracts, etc.," written on four leaves of paper, containing six and a half pages.

13. "Sloane, 3848," 1646. B. Museum. Published in Old Charges. Written on paper.

14. "Sloane, 3323," 1659. B. Museum.

Published in Masonic Sketches. Written on six leaves, 5 x 4 inches.

15. "Buchanan," seventeenth century. Freemasons' Hall, London. Published in Gould's History. A parchment roll; 1660 to 1680.

16. "Kilwinning," seventeenth century. "Mother Kilwinning Lodge," Scotland. Hughan's Masonic Sketches (Part II.).

17. "Acheson Haven," 1666. G. Lodge of Scotland.

18. "Aberdeen," 1670. Ancient Lodge at Aberdeen.

19. "Melrose, No. 2," 1674. Old Lodge at Melrose, Scotland.

20. "Hope," seventeenth century. Lodge of "Hope," Bradford, Yorkshire.

21. "York, No. 5," seventeenth century. "York" Lodge, at York.

22. "York, No. 6," seventeenth century. The "York" Lodge.

23. "Antiquity," 1686. Lodge of Antiquity, London.

24. "Supreme Council, No. 1," 1686. 33 Golden Square, London.

25. "York, No. 4," 1693. The "York" Lodge

26. "Alnwick," 1701. Alnwick.

27. "York, No. 2," 1704. The "York" Lodge.

28. "Scarborough," 1705. G. Lodge of Canada.

29. "Papworth," 1714. Wyatt Papworth, London.

30. "Gateshead," 1730. Lodge of "Industry," Gateshead.

Marconis, Gabriel Mathieu, more frequently known as De Negre, from his dark complexion, was the founder and first G. Master and G. Hierophant of the Rite of Memphis, brought by Sam'l Honis, a native of Cairo, from Egypt, in 1814, who with Baron Dumas and the Marquis de la Rognie, founded a Lodge of the Rite at Montauban, France, on April 30, 1815, which was closed March 7, 1816. In a work entitled The Sanctuary of Memphis, by Jacques Etienne Marconis, the author—presumptively the son of G. M. Marconis—who styles himself the founder of the Rite of Memphis, thus briefly gives an account of its origin: “The Rite of Memphis, or Oriental Rite, was introduced into Europe by Ormus, a seraphic priest of Alexandria and Egyptian sage, who had been converted by St. Mark, and reformed the doctrines of the Egyptians in accordance with the principles of Christianity. The disciples of Ormus continued until 1118 to be the sole guardians of ancient Egyptian wisdom, as purified by Christianity and Solomonian science. This science they communicated to the Templars. They were then known by the title of Knights of Palestine, or Brethren Rose Croix of the East. In them the Rite of Memphis recognizes its immediate founders.”

The above, coming from the G. Hierophant and founder, should satisfy the most scrupulous as to the conversion of Ormus by St. Mark, and his then introducing the Memphis Rite. But Marconis continues as to the object and intention of his Rite: “The Masonic Rite of Memphis is a combination of the ancient mysteries; it taught the first men to render homage to the Deity. Its dogmas are based on the principles of humanity; its mission is the study of that wisdom which serves to discern truth; it is the beneficent dawn of the development of reason and intelligence; it is the worship of the qualities of the human heart and the impression of its vices; in fine, it is the echo of religious toleration, the union of all belief, the bond between all men, the symbol of sweet illusions of hope, preaching the faith in God that saves, and the charity that blesses.”

We are further told by the Hierophant founder that “The Rite of Memphis is the sole depository of High Masonry, the true primitive Rite, the Rite par excellence, which has come down to us without any alteration, and is consequently the only Rite that can justify its origin and the combined exercise of its rights by constitutions, the authenticity of which cannot be questioned. The Rite of Memphis, or Oriental Rite, is the veritable Masonic tree, and all systems, whatsoever they be, are but detached branches of this institution, venerable for its great antiquity, and born in Egypt. The real deposit of the principles of Masonry, written in the Chaldean language, is preserved in the sacred ark of the Rite of Memphis, and in part in the Grand Lodge of Scotland, at Edinburgh, and in the Maronite Convent on Mount Lebanon.” “Brother Marconis de Negre, the Grand Hierophant, is the sole consecrated depository of the traditions of this Sublime Order.”

The above is enough to reveal the character of the father and reputed son for truth, as also of the institution founded by them, which, like the fire-fly, is seen now here, now there, but with no steady beneficial light. Also, see Memphis, MACKEY.

Marconis, Jacques Etienne. Born at Montauban, January 3, 1795; died at Paris, November 21, 1868. See Memphis, Rite of, MACKEY.

Marduk. A victorious warrior-god, described on one of the Assyrian clay tablets of the British Museum, who was said to have engaged the monster Tiamat in a cosmogonic struggle. He was armed with a namzar (grappling-hook), ariktu (lance), shibbu (lasso), qashtu (bow), zizpau (club), and kabab (shield), together with a dirk in each hand.

Maria Theresa. Empress of Austria, who showed great hostility to Freemasonry, presumably from religious leanings and advisers. Her husband was Francis I., elected Emperor of Germany in 1745. He was a zealous Mason, and had been initiated at the Hague in 1731, at a Special Lodge, at which Lord Chesterfield and Dr. Desaguliers were present. He was raised at Houghton Hall, the same year, while on a visit to England. He assisted to found the Lodge “Drei Kanonen,” at Vienna, constituted in 1742. During the forty years’ reign of Maria Theresa, Freemasonry was tolerated in Vienna doubtless through the intercession of the Emperor. It is stated in the Pocket Companion of 1754, one hundred grenadiers were sent to break up the Lodge, taking twelve prisoners, the Emperor escaping by a back staircase. He answered for and freed the twelve prisoners. His son, Emperor Joseph, inherited good-will to Masonry. He was G. Master of the Viennese Masons at the time of his death.

Martinism. See Rite des Elus Coens.

Masoney. Used in the Strassburg Constitutions, and other German works of the Middle Ages, as equivalent to the modern Masonry. Kloss translates it by Masonhood. Lessing derives it from masa, Anglo-Saxon, a table, and says it means a Society of the Table. Nicolai deduces it from the low Latin massonya, which means both a club and a key, and says it means an exclusive society or club, and so, he thinks, we get our word Masonry. Krause traces it to mas, mase, food or a banquet. It is a pity to attack these speculations, but we are inclined to look at Masoney as simply a corruption of the English Masonrie.

Masonic Colors. The colors appropriated by the Fraternity are many, and even shades of the same color. The principal ones are blue, to the Craft degrees; purple, to the Royal Arch; white and black, to the Order of the Temple; while all colors are used in the respective degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite: notably, the nine-colored girdle, intertwined with a tenth, worn in the Fourteenth Degree of the last-named system.

Masonic Literature. See Literature of Masonry, MACKEY.

Masons, Company of. One of the Livery Companies of London, but not one of the twelve great ones. It had a coat-of-arms granted in 1464, confirmed by Thomas Benett in 1521. It is doubtful, somewhat, when this Company was actually incorporated by Royal Charter. Ashmole dwells somewhat upon this. He calls himself the "Senior Fellow" among them, but probably means that he was the oldest Freemason among those present. Whether Ashmole was admitted to what we call the Second Degree is at present impossible to state; but the Rev. Bro. Woodford says: "Though following the evidence of the Scottish Minute Books as far as they are decisive on the subject—as we have, so far, no available English evidence of that date—we should be inclined to say Fellow of Craft." "Fellows" appears to be indifferently used. The accepted "Fellows" seem to have been nine in number. There were evidently two associations, the one being the "Masons' or Freemasons' Company," the other the "Society of Freemasons," to which Robert Padgett Clerk belonged, who transcribed the Antiquity MSS. in 1686.

Masons, Emperor of all the. A degree in the collection of Fustier.

Masora. A Hebrew work on the Bible, intended to secure it from any alterations or innovations. Those who composed it were termed Masorites, who taught from tradition, and who invented the Hebrew points. They were also known as Melchites.

Massena, Andre. Duke of Rivoli, Prince of Essling, and a Marshal of France, born at Nice in 1758. Early in the French Revolution he joined a battalion of volunteers, and soon rose to high military rank. He was a prominent grand officer of the French Grand Orient. He was designated by Napoleon, his master, as the Robber, in consequence of his being so extortionate.

Mathoc. (Amiability, sweetness.) The name of the Third Step of the Mystic Ladder of the Kadosh of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Matter. A subject deemed of important study to the alchemical and hermetical devotee. The subject will not be discussed here. It holds a valued position for instruction in the Society of the Rosicrucians, who hold that matter is subject to change, transformation, and apparent dissolution; but, in obedience to God's great laws of economy, nothing is lost, but is simply transferred.

Maurer. German for Mason, as Maurerei is for Masonry, and Freimaurer for Freemason.

Maurer, Grüs. A German Masonic operative expression, divided by some into Gruss Maurer, Wort Maurer, Schrift Maurer, and Briefträger—that is, those who claimed aid and recognition through signs and proving, and those who carried written documents.

Maut. The consort of the god Amon, usually crowned with a pschent or double diadem, emblem of the sovereignty of the two regions. Sometimes a vulture, the symbol of maternity, of heaven, and knowledge of the future, shows its head on the forehead of the goddess, its wings forming the head-dress. Horapollo says the vulture designates maternal love because it feeds its young with its own blood; and, according to Pliny, it represents heaven because no one can reach its nest, built on the highest rocks, and, therefore, that it is begotten of the winds. Maut is clothed in a long, close-fitting robe, and holds in her hand the sacred Anch, or sign of life.

Maximilian, Joseph I. King of Bavaria, who, becoming incensed against the Fraternity, issued edicts against Freemasons in 1799 and 1804, which he renewed in 1814.

Mecklenburg. Masonry was introduced here in 1754, but not firmly rooted until 1799. There are two Provincial G. Lodges, with 13 Lodges and 1250 Brethren.

Medals. No Masonic medal appears to have been found earlier than that of 1733, commemorative of a Lodge being established at Florence, by Lord Charles Sackville. The Lodge appears not to have been founded by regular authority; but, however that may be, the event was commemorated by a medal, a copy of which exists in the collection in possession of the Lodge "Minerva of the Three Palms," at Leipzig. The obverse contains a bust representation of Lord Sackville, with the inscription—"Carolus Sackville, Magister, Fl." The reverse represents Harpocrates in the attitude of silence, leaning upon a broken column, and holding in his left arm the cornucopia filled with rich fruits, also the implements of Masonry, with a thyrus, staff, and serpent resting upon the fore and back ground.

fifteen cents. The above was struck at Rome, under Tiberius, A. D. 18. The portrait is "Tiberius;" the reverse, the "God-goddess Clemency." The inscription reads: "Tiberius Cæsar Augustus, the son of the Deified Augustus, the High Priest."

Two medals, weighing 120 grains each, of silver, about thirty cents, were struck off at Jerusalem, under Simon Maccabee, the Jewish ruler, B. C. 138, 139. They are the oldest money coined by the Jews. The devices are the brazen laver that stood before the Temple, and three lilies springing from one stem. The inscriptions, translated from the Hebrew of the oldest style, says, "Half-shekel; Jerusalem the Holy."

Bro. Robt. Morris and Bro. Coleman, in their Calendar, furnish much valuable information on this subject.

THE JEWISH HALF SHEKEL OF SILVER (TWO SPECIMENS).

Megacosm. An intermediate world, great, but not equal to the Macrocosm, and yet greater than the Microcosm, or little world, man.

Mehen. An Egyptian mythological serpent, the winding of whose body represented the tortuous course of the sun in the nocturnal regions. The serpentine course taken when travelling through darkness. The direction metaphorically represented by the initiate in his first symbolic journey as Practise in the Society of the Rosicrucians.

Mehour. Space, the name given to the feminine principle of the deity by the Egyptians.

Meister. German for Master; in French, Maître; in Dutch, Meester; in Swedish, Mastar; in Italian, Maestro; in Portuguese, Mestre. The old French word appears to have been Meistrier. In old French operative laws, Le Mestre was frequently used.

Memphis. See Marconis Gabriel Mathieu.

Mer-Sker. The space in which the sun moves, as an Egyptian personification, signifying the habitation of Horus.

Merzdorf, J. L. T. A learned German Mason, born in 1812. Initiated in Apollo Lodge, at Leipsic, in 1834. He resuscitated the Lodge "Zum goldenen Hirsch," Oldenburg, and was for years Deputy Master. He published Die Symbole, etc., Leipsic, 1836, and later several other works.

Meshia, Meshiane. Corresponding to Adam and Eve, in accordance with Persian cosmogony.

Metusael. The name given to the Hebrew quarryman, who is represented in some legends as one of the assassins. Fano and Amru being the other two.

Mezuza. The third fundamental principle of Judaism, or the sign upon the door-post. The precept is founded upon the command, "And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates" (Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21). The door-posts must be those of a dwelling; synagogues are excluded.

The Karaite Jews affix Mezuzas to synagogues, and not to private houses. The Mezuza is constructed as follows: the two above-mentioned portions of Scripture are written on ruled vellum prepared according to Rabbinical rules, then rolled and fitted into a metallic tube. The word Shaddai (Almighty) is written on the outside of the roll, and can be read, when in the tube, through a slot. The Mezuza is then nailed at each end on the right-hand door-post, while the following prayer is being said: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God! King of the Universe, who hath sanctified us with His laws, and commanded us to fix the Mezuza." Under the word Shaddai some Jews write the three angelic names Coozu, Bemuchsaz, Coozu. To these some pray for success in business.

The Talmud estimates the virtue of the Talith, the Phylacteries, and the Mezuzah in the following terms: "Whosoever has the phylacteries bound to his head and arm, and the fringes thrown over his garments, and the Mezuzah fixed on his door-post, is safe from sin; for these are excellent memorials, and the angels secure him from sin; as it is written, 'The angel of the Lord encamped round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them'" (Ps. xxxiv. 7).

Millin de Grand Maison, A. L. Born, 1759; died, 1818. Founder of the Magasin Encyclopédique. He was a Mason under the Rite Ecossais, and also belonged to the "Mère Loge" of the "Rite Ecossais Philosophique."

Mischchan, Mischaphereth, Mischtai, מִשְׁכַּן דְּעֵדָה, Tent of Testimony. מִשְׁכַּן וּמִנָּה, Tent of Festival. See Twenty-fourth Degree of the Scottish Rite. מִשְׁטֵּי is used in the Thirtieth Degree.

Mistletoe. (Viscum Album.) In Scandinavian countries called Mistel. A parasitic evergreen plant bearing a glutinous fruit. When found attached to the oak, where it is rare, it was an object of superstitious regard among the Druids. It was from a fragment of this plant that the dart was made which cost the life of Balder, according to the Scandinavian Mysteries. See Balder.

The Mistletoe, to the Scandinavian, is the coincident symbol of the acacia to the Mason, the ivy to those of the Mysteries of Dionysius, the myrtle to those of Ceres, the erica or heath to those of the Osirian, the lettuce to those of the Adonisian, and the lotus or water-lily to those of India and Egypt. The Mistletoe that caused the death of Balder was deemed sacred as the representative of the number three. The berries and leaves of the plant or vine grow in clusters of three united on one stalk. It was profanation to touch it. It was gathered with ceremony, and then consecrated, when it was reputed to possess every sanative virtue, and denominated "All Heal."

Mitchell, James W. S. A Masonic writer and journalist, was born in the State of Kentucky, in the year 1800. He was initiated into Masonry in Owen Lodge, at Port William, now Carrollton, Kentucky, in the year 1821. He subsequently removed to the State of Missouri, where he took a prominent position in the Masonic fraternity, and held the offices of Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter, and Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templars. In 1848 he established, in the city of St. Louis, a monthly journal, entitled the Masonic Signal and Literary Mirror, which he removed to Montgomery, Alabama, in 1852, where it lasted for a short time, and then was discontinued for want of patronage. In 1858 he published The History of Freemasonry and Masonic Digest, in two volumes, octavo. Brother Mitchell was a warm-hearted and devoted Mason, but, unfortunately for his reputation as an author, not an accomplished scholar, hence his style is deficient, not only in elegance, but even in grammatical purity. His natural capacity, however, was good, and his arguments as a controversialist were always trenchant, if the language was not polished. As a Masonic jurist his decisions have been considered generally, but by no means universally, correct. His opinions were sometimes eccentric, and his History possesses much less value than such a work should have, in consequence of its numerous inaccuracies, and the adoption by its author of all the extravagant views of earlier writers on the origin of Masonry. He died at Griffin, Georgia, November 12, 1873, having been for many years a great sufferer from illness. (Dr. Mackey.)

Moabite Stone. A relic of black basalt, rounded at the top, two by four feet, across it being an inscription of thirty-four lines in the letters of the Hebrew-Phœnician alphabet, discovered in the ruins of ancient Dibon, by Dr. Klein, a German missionary, in 1869. A record of Mesha, King of Moab, who (2 Kings iii. 5), after Ahab's death, "rebelled against the King of Israel." Chemosh was the national god of the Moabites. The covenant name of the God of Israel occurs in the inscription, showing that the name was not then unpronounceable, or unknown to the neighboring nations. The described wars date in the tenth century B. C.

Moabon (מֹאבֹּן). He whom the Junior Warden represents in the 14th Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite, as the tried and trusty friend of Hiram the Builder. (See Gen. xix. 36.)

Mohammed. See Koran.

Mohrim. Initiates, pilgrims, those entering upon an important undertaking.

Moir, Francis Rawdon, Baron. Born 1754, died 1826. A distinguished statesman and Mason. He was Acting Grand Master of England from 1790 to 1812. Also Grand Master of Scotland in 1806. As a Mason he was always energetic. Dr. Oliver says, "To no person had Masonry for many years been more indebted than to the Earl of Moira, now Marquess Hastings." He died while governor of Malta.

Moloch. (Heb. Molech, king.) The chief god of the Phœnicians, and a god of the Ammonites. Human sacrifices were offered at his shrine, and it was chiefly in the valley of Tophet, to the east of Jerusalem, that this brutal idolatry was perpetrated. Solomon built a temple to Moloch upon the Mount of Olives, and Manasseh, long after, imitated his impiety by making his son pass through the fire kindled in honor of this deity. Wierus calls Moloch Prince of the realm of tears.

First Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood

Of human sacrifice and parents' tears;

Though for the noise of drums and timbrels loud,

Their children's cries unheard, that passed through fire

To his grim idol. . . Nor content with such

Audacious neighborhood, the wisest heart

Of Solomon he led, by fraud, to build

His temple right against the temple of God,

On that opprobrious hill; and made his grove,

The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence

And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell.

—Pur. Lost, B. 1.

Moore, Charles Whitlock. A distinguished American Masonic journalist, born in Boston, Mass., March 29, 1801. His own account of his initiation into Masonry is in the following words: "In February, 1822, I was proposed for the degrees of Masonry in Massachusetts Lodge, then, as now, one of the three oldest in Boston, and but for the intervention of business engagements, I should have been received into Masonry on the evening of my coming of age. Before that evening arrived, however, I was called temporarily to the State of Maine, where, in May following, I was admitted into Kennebec Lodge, at Hallowell, with the consent and approbation of the Lodge in which I had been originally proposed. I received the third degree on the evening of the 12th of June."

On October 10, 1822, he affiliated with the Lodge St. Andrew. In October, 1872, that Lodge celebrated his semi-centennial membership by a festival.

In 1825 he took the Capitular Degrees in St. Andrew's Chapter, and was elected High Priest in 1840, and subsequently Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter. He was made a Knight Templar in Boston Encampment about the year 1830, and was Eminent Commander in 1837. In 1841 he was elected Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, which office he held for three years. In 1832 he received the Royal and Select Degrees in Boston Council, over which he presided for twelve years. He was elected General Grand Captain-General of the Grand Encampment of the United States in 1847, and General Grand Generalissimo in 1850. In 1844 he was received into the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, and in the same year was elected Secretary-General of the Holy Empire in the Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States, an office which he held until his resignation in 1862.

"When he was elected R. G. Secretary of the Grand Lodge in 1834," says Brother John T. Heard, in his Historical Account of Columbian Lodge (page 472), "it was the moment when the anti-Masonic excitement was raging with its greatest violence in this State, and his first official act was to attest the memorial written by him, surrendering to the Legislature the act of incorporation of the Grand Lodge."

The Grand Lodge surrendered its charter and its corporate powers that it might escape the persecution of an anti-Masonic Legislature. The memorial, however, boldly stated that "by divesting itself of its corporate powers, the Grand Lodge has relinquished none of its Masonic attributes or prerogatives." In Masonic authorship, Bro. Moore is principally distinguished as a journalist. In 1825 he established the Masonic Mirror, which was merged in 1834 in the Bunker Hill Aurora, a paper with whose Masonic department he was associated. In 1841 he commenced the publication of the Freemason's Monthly Magazine, which he published for 33 years, in fact until his death. In 1828 and 1829 he published the Amaranth, or Masonic Garland; in 1843 the Masonic Trestle-Board. Brother Moore died at Boston, Mass., of pneumonia, on December 12, 1878.

Morana. The Bohemian goddess of winter and death, Maryana of Scandinavia.

Mormon Faith. See Book of Mormon.

Morris, Robert, LL.D. Born August 31, 1818. Was first brought to Masonic light March 5, 1846, in Oxford Lodge, at a place of the same name in Mississippi. The life of Bro. Morris has been so active and untiring for the benefit of the institution of Masonry, that he has had the opportunity of filling very many positions in all the departments of Masonry, and was Grand Master of Masons of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky in 1858-59. His writings cover Masonic jurisprudence, rituals and hand-books, Masonic belles-lettres, history and biography, travels, and contributions to The Review, Keystone, Advocate, N. Y. Dispatch, and other papers and periodicals. His Masonic songs and poetic effusions stand out in prominent volumes on the shelf. He is the author of We Meet upon the Level, which is sufficient to render his name immortal. A complete biography of Bro. Robert Morris would fill volumes.

Mount Caf. In the Mohammedan mythology, a fabulous mountain which encircles the earth. The home of the giants and fairies, and rests upon the sacred stone Sakhrat, of which a single grain gives miraculous powers. It is of an emerald color, and its reflected light is the cause of the tints of the sky.

Mozart, J. C. W. G. Born in 1756 at Salzburg, and died December 5, 1791, at Vienna. One of the greatest and most delightful of musical composers. He first saw the Masonic light about 1780, and was a member of the Lodge "Zur gekronten Hoffnung." There were many musical compositions and dedications to Masonry by this eminent composer.

Murat, Joachim. Born in 1771, executed in 1815. The great cavalry general of Napoleon, and titular king of Naples. In 1803 he was appointed S. G. Warden in the Grand Orient of France. When the 5th Supreme Council of the World was established at Naples, on the 11th June, 1809, by the Supreme Council at Milan, a concordat became necessary, and was executed 3d May, 1811, between the Grand Orient which was created June 24, 1809, and the Supreme Council of Naples, whereby the latter should have sole control over the degrees beyond the 18th, in like manner as signified in the concordat of France. King Joachim Murat accepted the supreme command of both bodies. The change in his political surroundings allowed him no permanent rest.

Murat, Joachim, Prince. Son of the King of Naples. Was appointed Grand Master of the Grand Orient of France, and initiated February 26, 1825. He resigned the office in 1861.

Musical Instruments, Ancient. As in the Fellow Crafts' degree, music is dilated upon as one of the liberal arts, the sweet and harmonious sounds being the representative of that harmony which should ever exist among the brethren, we are apt to inquire what were the instruments used by the ancients in their mystical service. The oldest ever discovered, we believe, is a small clay pipe not over three inches in length, found by Captain Willock among the presumed ruins of Babylon; if so, it must be 2600 years old. By the use of the two finger holes, the intervals of the common chord, C, E, and G, are produced, or the harmonic triad. From the ruins of Nineveh we have countless representations of the harp, with strings varying from ten to twenty-six; the lyre, identical in structure with that of the Greeks; a harp-shaped instrument held horizontally, and the six to ten strings struck with a plectrum, which has been termed the Asor, from its resemblance to the Hebrew instrument of that name. There is also the guitar-shaped instrument, and a double pipe with a single mouthpiece and finger-holes on each pipe. The Assyrians used musical bells, trumpets, flutes, drums, cymbals, and tambourines. The Abyssinians call their lyre the Kissar (Greek, kithara). There is also the flute, called Monaulos, which is of great antiquity, and named by the Egyptians Photius, or curved flute. The crooked horn or trumpet, called Buccina, and the Cithara, held sacred in consequence of its shape being that of the Greek delta.

Muta. The Roman goddess of silence.

Muttra, or Mathura. The birth-place of the Hindu Redeemer, Krishna. The capital of a district in the North-west Provinces of British India.

Myrrh. A resinous gum of a tree growing in Arabia, valued from the most ancient times (Gen. xxxvii. 25). It was among the presents Jacob sent to Egypt, and those brought to the infant Jesus by the wise men of the East.

Mysteries, Mexican. Instituted among the Mexicans (Aztecs), and was of a sacred nature. The adherents adopted the worship of some special deity, Quetzalcoatl (the Mexican Saviour), under secret rites, and rendered themselves seclusive. A similar order was that called Tlamacazajotl, also the order known as Telpochtliztli. It is understood that under the sway of the Aztecs, the Mexican Mysteries had some Masonic affinities. See Aztec Writings.

Mystic Crown, Knights and Companions of the. A Society formed by the adherents of Mesmer, in August, 1787, of a beneficent, non-political, and non-sectarian nature, to which Master Masons only were admitted.

N.

N. (Heb. נ.) The fourteenth letter in the English and Hebrew alphabets; its numerical value is 50, and its definition, fish. As a final, Nun is written ן, and then is of the value of 700. The Hebrew divine appellation is נִרְנָה, or Formidabilis.

Naharda, Brotherhood of. After the destruction of the Solomonian Temple, the captives formed an association while slaves at Naharda, on the Euphrates, and are there said to have preserved the secret mysteries.

Naos. The ark of the Egyptian gods. A chest or structure with more height than depth, and thereby unlike the Israelitish Ark of the Covenant. The winged figures embraced the lower part of the Naos, while the cherubim of the Ark of Yahveh were placed above its lid. Yahveh took up his abode above the propitiatory or covering between the wings of the cherubim, exteriorly, while the gods of Egypt were reputed as hidden in the interior of the Naos of the sacred barks, behind hermetically closed doors.

Napoleon I. It has been claimed, and with much just reason, as shown in his course of life, that Napoleon the Great was a member of the Brotherhood, and it is said was initiated at Malta, between June 12 and July 19, 1798. The Abeille Maçonnique of 1829, and Clavel, in 1830, allege that he visited a lodge incognito in Paris. His life indicated favor to the fraternity, and in 1804 he appointed Joseph Buonaparte G. Master of the Grand Orient. Lucien and Louis Buonaparte were of the fraternity, as also Jerome. Louis Napoleon III. was a member of the Supreme Council A. A. Scottish Rite of France.

Narbonne, Rite of. See Philadelphians, MACKAY.

Neith. The Egyptian synonym of the Greek Athené or Minerva.

Nemesis. According to Hesiod, the daughter of Night, originally the personification of the moral feeling of right and a just fear of criminal actions; in other words, Conscience. A temple was erected to Nemesis at Attica. She was at times called Adrastea and Rhamnusia, and represented in the earliest days a young virgin like unto Venus; at a later period, as older and holding a helm and wheel. At Rhamnus there was a statue of Nemesis of Parian marble executed by Phidias. The festival in Greece held in her honor was called Nemesia.

Neocorus. A name of the guardian of the Temple.

Nephalia. Festivals, without wine, celebrated in honor of the lesser deities.

Nergal. (Heb. נִרְגַּל.) The synonym of misfortune and ill-luck. The Hebrew name for Mars; and in astrology the lesser Malefic. The word in Sanskrit is Nrigal.

New Templars. An Order of five degrees instituted in France in the early part of this century. The degrees were termed—Initiati; Intimi Initiati; Adepti; Orientales Adepti; and Magnae aquilae nigrae sancti Johannes Apostoli Adepti.

Nick. (Danish, Nikken.) The spirit of the waters, an enemy of man, the devil, or in the vulgate, "Old Nick."

Nicotiates, Order of. A secret order mentioned by Clavel, teaching the doctrines of Pythagoras.

Nihongi. ("Chronicles of Nihon.") The companion of the Kojiki; the two works together forming the doctrinal and historic basis of Sintonism. The Japanese adherents of Sinsyn are termed Sintus, or Sintoos, who worship the gods, the chief of which is Ten-sio-dai-yin. The Nihongi was composed about 720 A. D., with the evident design of giving a Chinese coloring to the subject-matter of the Kojiki, upon which it is founded.

Nonis. A significant word in the 32d Degree of the Scottish Rite. The original old French rituals endeavor to explain it, and say that it and two other words in conjunction are formed out of the initials of the words of a particular aphorism which has reference to the secret arcana and "sacred treasure" of Masonry. Out of several interpretations, no one can be positively asserted as the original, although the intent is apparent to him to whom the same may lawfully belong.

Normal. A perpendicular to a curve; and included between the curve and the axis of the abscissas. Sometimes a square, used by operative Masons, for proving angles.

Nornae. In the Scandinavian Mysteries, these were three maidens, known as Urd, Verdandi, and Skuld, signifying Past, Present, and Future. Their position is seated near the Urdar-wells under the world-tree Yggdrasil, and there determine the fate of both gods and men. They daily draw water from the spring, and with it and the surrounding clay sprinkle the ash-tree Yggdrasil, that the branches may not wither and decay.

North. This point of the compass, or place of Masonic darkness, must not be construed as implying that in the Temple of Solomon no light or ventilation was had from this direction. The Talmud, and as well Josephus, allude to an extensive opening toward the North, framed with costly magnificence, and known as the great "Golden Window." There were as many openings in the outer wall on the north as on the south side. There were three entrances through the "Chel" on the north and six on the south. See Temple.

While once within the walls and Chel of the temple all advances were made from east to west, yet the north side was mainly used for stabling, slaughtering, cleansing, etc., and contained the chambers of broken knives, defiled stones, of the house of burning, and of sheep. The Masonic symbolism of the entrance of an initiate from the north, or more practically from the north-west, and advancing toward the position occupied by the corner-stone in the north-east, forcibly calls to mind the triplet of Homer:

"Two marble doors unfold on either side;
Sacred the South by which the gods descend;
But mortals enter on the Northern end."

So in the Mysteries of Dionysos, the gate of entrance for the aspirant was from the north; but when purged from his corruptions, he was termed indifferently new-born or immortal, and the sacred south door was thence accessible to his steps.

In the Middle Ages, below and to the right of the judges stood the accuser, facing north; to the left was the defendant, in the north facing south. Brother George F. Fort, in his Antiquities of Freemasonry, says: "In the centre of the court, directly before the judge, stood an altar piece, upon which an open Bible was displayed. The south, to the right of the justiciaries, was deemed honorable and worthy for a plaintiff; but the north was typical of a frightful and diabolical sombreness. Thus, when a solemn oath of purgation was taken in grievous criminal accusations, the accused turned toward the north. The judicial headsman, in executing the extreme penalty of outraged justice, turned the convict's face northward. When Earl Hakon bowed a tremulous knee before the deadly powers of Paganism, and sacrificed his seven-year old child, he gazed out upon the far-off, gloomy north.

"In Nastrond, or shores of death, stood a revolting hall, whose portals opened toward the north—the regions of night. North, by the Jutes, was denominated black or sombre; the Frisians called it fear corner. The gallows faced the north, and from these hyperborean shores everything base and terrible proceeded. In consequence of this belief, it was ordered that, in the adjudication of a crime, the accused should be on the north side of the court enclosure. And in harmony with the Scandinavian superstition, no Lodge of Masons illumines the darkened north with a symbolic light, whose brightness would be unable to dissipate the gloom of that cardinal point with which was associated all that was sinister and direful."

North Star. This star is frequently used as a Masonic symbol, as are the morning star, the day star, the seven stars. Thus, the morning star is the forerunner of the Great Light that is about to break upon the Lodge; or, as in the grade of G. Master Architect, twelfth of the Scottish system, the initiate is received at the hour "when the day star has risen in the east, and the north star looked down upon the seven stars that circle round him." The symbolism is truth; thus, the North star is the pole star, the Polaris of the mariner, the Cynosura, that guides Masons over the stormy seas of time. The seven stars are the symbol of right and justice to the order and the country.

Novitiate. The time of probation, as well as of preparatory training, which, in all religious orders, precedes the solemn profession at least one year. By dispensation only can the period of time be reduced. Novices are immediately subject to a superior called Master of Novices, and their time must be devoted to prayer and to liturgical training.

Nuk-pe-nuk. The Egyptian equivalent for the expression "I am that I am."

Nun. (Heb. נון, a fish, in Syriac an inkhorn.) The Chaldaic and hieroglyphic form of this Hebrew letter was like Fig. 1, and the Egyptian like Fig. 2, signifying fishes in any of these forms. Joshua was the son of Nun, or a fish, the deliverer of Israel. As narrated of the Noah in the Hindu account of the deluge, whereby the forewarning of a fish caused the construction of an ark and the salvation of one family of the human race from the flood of waters. See Beginnings of History, by Lenormant.

Nyaya. The name of the second of the three great systems of ancient Hindu philosophy.

Nyctazontes. An ancient sect who praised God by day, but rested in quiet and presumed security during the night.

O.

O. The fifteenth letter in the English and in most of the Western alphabets. The corresponding letter in the Hebrew and Phœnician alphabets was called Ayn, that is, eye; the primitive form of the Phœnician letter being the rough picture of an eye, or a circle with a dot in the centre. This dot will be observed in ancient MSS., but being dropped the circle forms the letter O. The numerical value is 70, and in Hebrew is formed thus, , the hieroglyphic being a plant, as well as at times a circle or an eye.

Oak Apple, Society of the. Instituted about 1658, and lapsed under the disturbances in England during the reign of James II., but it lingered among the Stuart adherents for many years.

Oannes. The earliest instructor of man in letters, sciences, and arts, specially in architecture, geometry, botany, and agriculture, and in all other useful knowledge, was the fish god Oannes (myth.). This universal teacher, according to Berossus, appeared in the Persian Gulf, bordering on Babylonia, and, although an animal, was endowed with reason and great knowledge. The usual appearance of the creature was that of a fish, having a human head beneath that of a fish, and feet like unto a man. This personage conversed with men during the day, but never ate with them. At Kouyunjik there was a colossal statue of the fish-god Oannes. The following is from the Book of Enoch (Vol. II., p. 154): "The Masons hold their grand festival on the day of St. John, not knowing that therein they merely signify the fish-god Oannes, the first Hermes and the first founder of the Mysteries, the first messenger to whom the Apocalypse was given, and whom they ignorantly confound with the fabulous author of the common Apocalypse. The sun is then (midsummer-day) in its greatest altitude. In this the Naros is commemorated." See Alexander Polyhistor.

Obed. (Heb. עֹבֵד, servant.) One of nine favored officials, selected by Solomon after the death of H. Abif.

Oboth. Ventriloquism. It will be found so denominated in the Septuagint version, Isaiah xxix. 3, also xix. 8.

Obrack, Hibernus. Grand Master of the Order of the Temple in 1392, according to the chronology of the Strict Observance of Germany.

Odem. (Heb. אֶדָם.) The carnelian or agate in the high-priest's breastplate. It was of a red color, and claimed to possess medical qualities.

Odin. The chief Scandinavian deity and father of Balder (which see). The counterpart of Hermes and Mercury in the Egyptian and Roman mythologies. Odin and his brothers Vili and Ve, the sons of Boer, or the first-born, slew Ymir or Chaos, and from his body created the world. As ruler of heaven, he sends daily his two black ravens, Thought and Memory, to gather tidings of all that is being done throughout the world.

Ogmios. The Druidical name for Hercules, who is represented with numberless fine chains proceeding from the mouth to the ears of other people, hence possessing the powers of eloquence and persuasion.

Onech. (Heb. פֶּנֶךְ.) The bird Phœnix, named after Enoch or Phenoch. Enoch signifies initiation. The Phœnix, in Egyptian mythological sculptures, as a bird, is placed in the mystical palm-tree. The Phœnix is the representative of eternal and continual regeneration, and is the Holy Spirit which brooded as a dove over the face of the waters, the dove of Noah and of Hasisatra or Xysuthrus (which see), which bore a sprig in its mouth.

Ophites. The Brotherhood of the Serpent, which flourished in the second century, and held that there were two principles of æons and the accompanying theogony. This Egyptian fraternity displayed a living serpent in their ceremonies, which was revered as a symbol of wisdom and a type of good.

Order Book. The book to which all appeals were made, in the Order of Strict Observance, as to matters of history, usage, or ritual. It was invariably bound in red.

Oriflamme. The ancient banner which originally belonged to the Abbey of St. Denis, and was borne by the Counts of Vezin, patrons of that church, but which, after the country of Vezin fell into the hands of the French crown, became the principal banner of the kingdom. It was charged with a saltire wavy Or, with rays issuing from the centre crossways; Seccee into five points, each bearing a tassel of green silk.

Ouriel. See Uriel, MACKEY.

Oziah. (Heb. זַיָּה; Latin, Fortitudo domini.) A prince of Judah, and the name of the Senior Warden in the Fifth Degree of the French Rite of Adoption.

P.

P. The sixteenth letter of the English and Greek alphabets, and the seventeenth of the Hebrew, in which last mentioned language its numerical value is 80, is formed thus פ, signifying a mouth in the Phœnician. The sacred name of God associated with this letter is פִּדְיָה, Phodeh or Redeemer.

Pachacamac. The Peruvian name for the Creator of the universe.

Palestine, Order of. Mentioned by Baron de Tschoudy, and it is said was the fountain whence the Chevalier Ramsay obtained his information for the regulation of his system.

Palla. An altar cloth, also a canopy borne over the head of royalty in Oriental lands.

Palmer, Henry L. Born in New York, October 18, 1819. A present resident of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and president of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. He is the author of the celebrated report, in October, 1849, which resulted in the union of the two Grand Lodges in New York, the "Herring-Phillips" and the "New York" Grand Lodge. Brother Palmer has occupied almost every known position in Craft Masonry, and has been the commanding officer of every one of its departments. He is P. G. Master of the G. Encampment of K. T. of the U. S., and the present G. Commander of the Supreme Council of the A. A. Scottish Rite, Northern Jurisdiction of the U. S. of America.

Pantheism. A speculative system, which, spiritually considered, identifies the universe with God, and, in the material form, God with the universe. Material Pantheism is subject to the criticism, if not to the accusation, of being atheistic. Pantheism is as aged as religion, and was the system of worship in India, as it was in Greece. Giordano Bruno was burned for his pantheistic opinions at Rome in 1600.

Pantheistic Brotherhood. Described by John Toland, in his Pantheisticon, as having a strong resemblance to Freemasonry. The Socratic Lodge in Germany, based on the Brotherhood, was of short duration.

Papyrus. "The papyrus leaf," says J. W. Simons, in his Egyptian Symbols, "is that plant which formed tablets and books, and forms the first letter of the name of the only eternal and all-powerful god of Egypt, Amon, who in the beginning of things created the world," whose name signified occult or hidden. The word עלה, ole, which signifies a leaf, and to inscribe on tablets forms עלם, olm, the antique origin of things, obscure time, hidden eternity.

The Turin Funeral Papyrus is a book published by Dr. Lepsius in original character, but translated by Dr. Birch. This Book of the Dead is invaluable as containing the true philosophic belief of the Egyptians respecting the resurrection and immortality. The manuscript has been gathered from portions which it was obligatory to bury with the dead. The excavations of mummies in Egypt have been fruitful in furnishing the entire work.

Parikchai, Agrouchada. An occult scientific work of the Brahmans. According to a work by Louis Jacolliot, 1884, the Fakirs produced phenomena at will with superior intervention or else with shrewd charlatanism: processes that were known to the Egyptians and Jewish Kabbalists. The doctrines are those known to the Alexandrian school, to the Gauls, and as well to the Christians. In the division of the Kabbala, the first treated of the History of the Genesis or Creation, and taught the science of nature; the second, or Mercaba, of the History of the Chariot, and contained a treatise on theology.

There were three degrees of initiation among the Brahmans:

1st. According to selection, the candidate became a Grihastha, a Pourohita or Fakir, or in twenty years a Guru.

2d. A Sannyassis or Cenobite and Vana-prasthas, and lived in the Temple.

3d. A Sannyassis-Nirvany or Naked Cenobite.

Those of the third degree were visible only once in five years, appearing in a column of light created by themselves, at midnight, and on a stand in the centre of a great tank. Strange sounds and terrific shrieks were heard as they were gazed upon as demi-gods, surrounded by thousands of Hindus.

The government was by a Supreme Council of seventy Brahmans, over seventy years of age, selected from the Nirvany, and chosen to see enforced the Law of the Lotus. The Supreme Chief, or Brahmata, was required to be over eighty years of age, and was looked upon as immortal by the populace. This Pontiff resided in an immense palace surrounded by twenty-one walls.

The primitive holy word composed of the three letters A. U. M., comprises the Vedic trinity, signifying Creation, Preservation, and Transformation, and symbolize all the initiatory secrets of the occult sciences. By some it has been taught that the "Honover," or primordial germ, as defined in the Avesta, existed before all else. Also see Manou, Book xi., Sloca 265. The following unexplained magical words were always inscribed in two triangles: L'OM. L'rhon-sh'hrum. SHO'RIM. Ramaya-Nahama.

He who possessed the word greater than the A. U. M. was deemed next to Brahma. The word was transmitted in a sealed box.

The Hindu triad, of which in later times OM is the mystic name, represents the union of the three gods, viz., a (Vishnu), u (Siva), m (Brahma). It may also be typical of the three Vedas. Om appears first in the Upanishads as a mystical monosyllable, and is thus set forth as the object of profound meditation. It is usually called pranava, more rarely aksharam. The Buddhists use Om at the beginning of their Vidyā Shad-akshari or mystical formula in six syllables (viz., Om māni pad me hūm). See Pitris and Indische Mystereien, in Addendum; and Aum, in MACKEY.

Paris Constitutions. A copy of these Constitutions, said to have been adopted in the thirteenth century, will be found in G. P. Depping's Collection de Documents inédits sur l'Histoire de France (Paris, 1837). A part of this work contains the Reglemens sur les arts et métiers de Paris, rédigés au 13me siècle et connus sous le nom de livre des métiers d'Etienne Boileau. This treats of the masons, stonecutters, plasterers, and mortar-makers, and, as Steinbrenner (Or. and Hist. of Mus., p. 104) says, "is interesting, not only as exhibiting the peculiar usages and customs of the Craft at that early period, but as showing the connection which existed between the laws and regulations of the French Masons and those of the Steinmetzen of Germany and the Masons of England." A translation of the Paris Constitutions was published in the Freemason's Magazine, Boston, 1863, p. 201. In the year 1743, the "English Grand Lodge of France" published, in Paris, a series of statutes, taken principally from Anderson's work of the editions of 1723 and 1738. It consisted of twenty articles, and bore the title of General Regulations taken from the Minutes of the Lodges, for the use of the French Lodges, together with the Alterations adopted at the General Assembly of the Grand Lodge, December 11, 1743, to serve as a rule of action for the said kingdom. A copy of this document, says Findel, was translated into German, with annotations, and published in 1856 in the Zeitschrift für Freimaurer of Altenberg.

Parlirer. In the Lodges of Stonemasons of the Middle Ages, there was a rank or class of workmen called Parlirers, literally, spokesmen. They were an intermediate class of officers between the Masters of the Lodges and the Fellows, and were probably about the same as our modern Wardens. Thus, in the Strasbourg Constitutions of 1459, it is said: "No Craftsman or Mason shall promote one of his apprentices as a parlirer whom he has taken as an apprentice from his rough state, or who is still in the years of apprenticeship," which may be compared with the old English charge that "no Brother can be a Warden until he has passed the part of a Fellow-Craft." They were called Parlirers, properly, says Heldmann, Parlierers, or Spokesmen, because, in the absence of the Masters, they spoke for the Lodge, to travelling Fellows seeking employment, and made the examination. There are various forms of the word. Kloss, citing the Strasbourg Constitutions, has Parlirer; Krause has, from the same document, Parlierer, but says it is usually Polier; Heldmann uses Parlierer, which has been now generally adopted.

Parole. A Mot de semestre, communicated by the Grand Orient of France, and in addition an annual word in November, which tends to show at once whether a member is in good standing.

Parsees. See Zend Avesta.

Parvin, Theodore S. Born January 15, 1817, in Cumberland Co., New Jersey. His journey in life gradually tending westward, he located in Ohio, and graduated in 1837 in the Cincinnati Law School. He was appointed private secretary by Robert Lucas, first governor of Iowa, in which State he became Judge of the Probate Court and afterwards "Curator and Librarian." Bro. Parvin was initiated in Nova Cesarea Lodge, No. 2, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 14, 1838, and raised the 9th of May following. He was exalted in Iowa City Chapter, No. 2, January 2, 1845. He has held many very prominent positions in Masonry; is, and has been since 1871, Grand Recorder of the G. Encampment K. T. of the U. S. A. In 1859 he received the Degrees of the Scottish Rite and was crowned in that year an Inspector-General 33d.

Passage. The Fourth Degree of the Fessler Rite, of which Patria forms the fifth.

"Passing the River." A mystical alphabet said to have been used by the Kabalists. These characters, with certain explanations, become the subject of consideration with brethren of the Fifteenth Degree A. A. Scottish Rite. The following are the characters:

⌈ 7 0 3 7 7 1 7 < ~ E

7 J 7 7 E V 3 Δ F X I

d g b A i S a k L p N

Pax Vobiscum. ("Peace be with you!") Used in the Eighteenth Degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Peetash. The demon of calumny in the religious system of Zoroaster, Persia.

Penalty. The origin of penalties invoked in Masonry has been the subject of much research. In addition to what is so well said by Dr. Mackey, as to obscuration, it may be judicious to note the opinion of Bro. G. F. Fort, and as well the law as set down in the Talmud. Bro. Fort says, in the 29th chap. of his Early History and Antiquities, that "Penalties inflicted upon convicts of certain grades during the Middle Ages, were terrible and inhuman.

"The most cruel punishment awaited him who broke into and robbed a Pagan temple. According to a law of the Frisians, such desecration was redressed by dragging the criminal to the seashore and burying the body at a point in the sands where the tide daily ebbed and flowed. (Lex Frianon., Add. Sap., Tit. 12.)

"A creditor was privileged to subject his delinquent debtor to the awful penalty of having the flesh torn from his breast and fed to birds of prey. Convicts were frequently adjudged by the ancient Norse code to have their hearts torn out. (Grimm, Deutsche Rechts-Altenthum, p. 690. And for the following, see pp. 693 and 700.) The oldest death penalties of the Scandinavians prescribed that the body should be exposed to fowls of the air to feed upon. Sometimes it was decreed that the victim be disembowelled, his body burnt to ashes and scattered as dust to the winds. Judges of the secret Vehmgericht passed sentences of death as follows: 'Your body and flesh to the beasts of the field, to the birds of the air, and to the fishes in the stream.' The judicial executioner, in carrying into effect this decree, severed the body in twain, so that, to use the literal text, 'the air might strike together between the two parts.' The tongue was oftentimes torn out as a punishment. A law of the early Roman Empire, known as ex Jure Orientis Caesareo, enacted that any person, suitor at law or witness, having sworn upon the evangelists, and proving to be a perjurer, should have the tongue cut from its roots.

A cord about the neck was used symbolically, in criminal courts, to denote that the accused was worthy of the extreme penalty of law by hanging or decapitation. When used upon the person of a freeman, it signified a slight degree of subjection or servitude."

Some eminent brethren of the Fraternity insist that the penalty had its origin in the manner in which the lamb was sacrificed under the charge of the Captain of the Temple, who directed the priests: and said, "Come and cast lots." "Who is to slaughter?" "Who is to sprinkle?" "Go and see if the time for slaughter approaches?" "Is it light in the whole East, even to Hebron?" and when the priest said "Yes," he was directed to "go and bring the lamb from the lamb-chamber;" this was in the north-west corner of the court. The lamb was brought to the north of the altar, its head southward and its face northward. The lamb was then slaughtered; a hole was made in its side, and thus it was hung up. The priest skinned it downward until he came to the breast, then he cut off the head, and finished the skinning; he tore out the heart; subsequently he cleft the body, and it became all open before him; he took out the intestines, etc.; and the various portions were divided as they had cast lots. (The Talmud, Joseph Barclay, LL.D.)

Pennsylvania. The Masonic historical interest in no one State of the Union centred so thoroughly as in the origin of Masonry and the formation of a Grand Lodge in Pennsylvania. A fraternal rivalry was warmly incited by this State claiming priority over Massachusetts and all other States as regards the great Brotherhood. The question seems to be now permanently removed from further inquiry. Indeed, Dr. Mackey, in his brief sketch in the body of this work, favored the Boston theory, but regretted his error before the printer's ink had dried.

It is now evident that a deputation was issued by the Duke of Norfolk, Grand Master of England, on June 5, 1730, to Daniel Coxe, of New Jersey, as "Provincial Grand Master of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, ordaining that the brethren who do now reside, or who may hereafter reside, in all or any of the said provinces, shall, and they are hereby empowered, every other year on the feast of St. John the Baptist, to elect a Provincial Grand Master, who shall have the power of nominating and appointing his Deputy Grand Master and Grand Wardens." That the brethren in Pennsylvania availed themselves of this authority on St. John the Baptist's day, 1732, and elected William Allen Grand Master; that at the succeeding election, June 24, 1734, Benjamin Franklin, who had become a member in February, 1731, was elected Grand Master. Other Grand Masters were elected from time to time, among them very eminent men; to wit, Thomas Hopkinson, Humphry Murray, James Hamilton, Joseph Shippen, William Ball, Joseph Shippen, Philip Syng, Thomas Bond, James Milnor, Josiah Randall, Chief-Justice Gibson, George M. Dallas, Chief-Justice Read, and Col. James Page.

The original ledger account of the first Masonic Lodge organized in Philadelphia, "St. John's," has been discovered by the indefatigable Junior Grand Warden, Clifford P. MacCalla, in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, covering the dates from June 24, 1731, to June 24, 1738. This book is doubtless the oldest Masonic Lodge record in America. It appears that it was presented to the Historical Society by George T. Ingham, of Salem, New Jersey, on November 8, 1880, he having received it from a descendant of David Hall, a partner of Benjamin Franklin in the printing and publishing business.

"Secessions and expulsions in England marked the period from 1738 to 1752, when another Grand Lodge was formed, composed of the seceding brethren, who . . . divided the third degree, and from the latter part of that degree formed a fourth degree, styled the Holy Royal Arch," presumably in 1740. This division was practically set on foot by the Ancients, afterwards so called, who were the Seceders, and were so recognized in contradistinction to the Moderns, who adhered to the three degree system. Of these latter, three Lodges existed in Pennsylvania in 1755. In 1758 the Grand Lodge of England, Ancients, issued warrants for Lodges Nos. 2 and 3 in Philadelphia, the latter being styled Royal Arch Lodge, No. 3. These Arch Lodges continued and prospered, although from the loss of records their earliest minutes only date 1767, and are thence continuous. On September 5, 1789, by the adoption of by-laws, the name of the Chapter appears as Jerusalem Chapter, No. 3. The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, on the 26th of December, 1795, opened the Grand Holy Royal Arch Chapter under its sanction, and thus was formed the first Grand Chapter in America.

Pentacle, The. The "pentaculum Salomonis," or magical pentalpha, not to be confounded with Solomon's seal. The pentacle is frequently referred to in hermetic formulæ.

Perfect Master. The Fifth Degree in the A. A. Scottish Rite, wherein Lodges of Sorrow are frequently observed.

Perfect Prussian. A grade invented at Geneva in 1770, and belonging to the Noachite rites.

Perfect Stone. A name frequently given to the cubic stone discovered in the 18th Degree of Perfection, the 10th of the Ineffable Series. It denotes justice and firmness, with all the moral lessons and duties in which the mystic cube is calculated to instruct us.

Periclyte, or Paraclete. (John xiv. 16.) Christ promised to send after him another paraclete. The followers of Mohammed have accepted the implication, claiming the newcomer to be Mohammed, and that he is paraclete, or illustrious.

Persia. From late discoveries of inscriptions pertaining to Cyrus, as mentioned in the excellent little London work, called Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments (pp. 166-186), A. H. Sayce, M.A., it would appear that this king was a polytheist, and that he was not a king of Persia, although he acquired that country after his conquest of Astyages, B. C. 559, between the sixth and ninth years of Nabonidos. Cyrus was king of Elam. The empire he founded was not a Persian one; Darius, the son of Hystaspes, at a subsequent period, was the real founder of that kingdom. Prof. Sayce continues: "It was only as the predecessor of Darius, and for the sake of intelligibility to the readers of a later day, that Cyrus could be called a king of Persia" (Ezra i. 2). The original words of his proclamation, "King of Elam," have been changed into the more familiar and intelligible "King of Persia." Elsewhere in the Bible (Isa. xxi. 1-10), when the invasion of Babylon is described, there is no mention of Persia, only of Elam and Media, the ancestral dominions of Cyrus. This is in strict accordance with the revelations of the Monuments, and testifies to the accuracy of the Old Testament records.

Cyrus never besieged Babylon, a city fifteen miles square. It opened its gates to his general without battle, B. C. 538. The description by Herodotus belongs to the reign of Darius. Mr. Bosanquet asserts that the Darius of the Book of Daniel is Darius the son of Hystaspes.

Cyrus had learned that a disaffected conquered people imported into a kingdom was a constant menace and danger, and he returned the Jewish exiles to Jerusalem to rebuild their city and be a fortress and check upon Egypt. The nations which had been brought from East and West were restored to their lands along with their gods. So it was with the captives of Judah. His dominions extended from the Hellespont almost to India.

Cyrus was a worshipper of Merodach, originally the Sun-god, who is mentioned and intended by the name Bel, and Nebo, his prophet (Isa. xlv. 1). His first act after acquiring Babylonia was to restore the Babylonian gods to their shrines, from which they had been removed by Nabonidos, and further asks for their intercession. The theory that Cyrus believed in but one supreme god—Ormudz—must be abandoned. God consecrated Cyrus to be His instrument in restoring His chosen people to their land, not because the king of Elam was a Monotheist, but because the period of prophecy, "ten weeks of years," was drawing to a close.

These statements are made upon the authority of the three inscriptions among the clay documents lately discovered in Babylonia by Mr. Rassam, and translated by Sir Henry Rawlinson and Mr. Pinches. The first of these is a cylinder, inscribed by order of Cyrus; the second a tablet, which describes the conquest of Babylonia by Cyrus; while the third is an account given by Nabonidos of his restoration of the temple of the Moon-god at Haran, and of the temples of the Sun-god and of Anunit at Sepharvaim.

Cyrus ascended the throne B. C. 559, and was slain in battle against the Massagetæ, B. C. 529. He was followed by Cambyses (son) until B. C. 521, when he was succeeded by Smerdis, a Magian usurper, who reigned seven months. Darius I., son of Hystaspes, a nobleman, conspired with six others and murdered Smerdis, when, by device, Darius obtained the throne over his companions,

B. C. 521. The celebrated siege of Babylon lasted two years; the city finally succumbed to the strategy of General Zopyrus, 516. Darius reigned 36 years, died B. C. 485.

Persian Faith. See Zend Avesta.

Philosophus. The fourth grade of the First Order of the Society of Rosicrucians, as practised in Europe and America.

Phylacteries. The second fundamental principle of Judaism is the wearing of phylacteries; termed by some writers Tataphoth, "ornaments," and refer to the law and commandments, as "Bind them about thy neck; write them upon the table of thine head" (Prov. iii. 3; vi. 21; viii. 3). The phylacteries are worn on the forehead and arm, and are called in Hebrew Te-phillin, from Palal, to pray. These consist of two leathern boxes. One contains four compartments, in which are inclosed four portions of the law written on parchment and carefully folded. The box is made of leather pressed upon blocks of wood specially prepared, the leather being well soaked in water. The following passages of the law are sewn into it: Ex. xiii. 1-10, 11-16; Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21. On this box is the letter שׁ (shin), with three strokes for the right side, and the same letter with four strokes for the left side of the wearer. The second box has but one compartment, into which the same passages of Scripture are sewed with the sinews of animals, specially prepared for this object. The phylacteries are bound on the forehead and arm by long leathern straps. The straps on the head must be tied in a knot shaped like the letter ד (daleth). The straps on the arm must go round it seven times, and three times around the middle finger, with a small surplus over in the form of the letter י (yod). Thus we have the שׁדאי, Shaddai, or Almighty. The phylacteries are kept in special bags, with greatest reverence, and the Rabbis assert "that the single precept of the phylacteries is equal to all the commandments."

Pike, Albert. Born at Boston, Mass., December 29, 1809, and is still living and laboring to consummate his Masonic life work. After a sojourn in early life in Mexico, he returned to the United States and settled in Little Rock, Arkansas, as an editor and lawyer. Subsequent to the war of the rebellion, in which he had cast his fortunes with the South, he located in Washington, D. C., uniting with ex-Senator Robert Johnson in the profession of the law, making his home, however, in Alexandria. His library, in extent and selections, is a marvel, especially in all that pertains to the wonders in ancient literature. Bro. Pike is the Sov. G. Commander of the Southern Supreme Council, A. A.

Scottish Rite, having been elected in 1859. He is Prov. G. Master of the G. Lodge of the Royal Order of Scotland in the U. S., and an honorary member of almost every Supreme Council in the world. His standing as a Masonic author and historian, and withal as a poet, is most distinguished, and his untiring zeal is without a parallel.

Pinnacles. Generally ornamented terminations much used in Gothic architecture. They are prominently referred to in the Eleventh Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite, where the pinnacles over the three gates support the warning to all evil-doers, and give evidence of the certainty of punishment following crime.

Pitaka. ("Basket.") The Bible of Buddhism, containing 116 volumes, divided into three classes, collectively known as the Tripitaka or Pitakattayan, that is, the "Triple Basket;" the Soutras, or discourses of Buddha; the Vinaga, or Discipline; and the Abhadharma, or Metaphysics. The canon was fixed about 240 B. C., and commands a following of more than one-third of the human race—the estimates vary from 340,000,000 to 500,000,000. Masonically considered, this indeed must be a great Light or Trestle-Board, if it is the guide of the conduct and practice of so vast a number of our brethren; for are not all men our brethren?

Pitdah. (Heb. פִּיטְדָּה) One of the twelve stones in the breastplate of the High Priest, of a yellow color. The Sanskrit for yellow is pita.

Pitris. Spirits. Among the Hindus, Pitris were spirits; so mentioned in the Agrouchada Parikchai, the philosophical compendium of the Hindu spiritists, a scientific work giving an account of the creation and the Mercaba, and finally the Zohar; the three principal parts of which treat "of the attributes of God," "of the world," and "of the human soul." A fourth part sets forth the relevancy of souls to each other, and the evocation of Pitris. The adepts of the occult sciences were said by the votaries of the Pitris of India to have "entered the garden of delights." See Parikchai, Agrouchada; also, Indische Mysterien.

Pointed Cubical Stone. The "Broached Thurnel" (see MACKEY), mentioned by Dr. George Oliver and others in the Tracing-Board of an Entered Apprentice, and known to the French Mason as the pierre cubique, has an axe inserted in the apex. Brother William S. Rockwell considered this feature in the Tracing-Board remarkable and suggestive of curious reflections, and thus reasoned: "The cubic stone pointed with an axe driven into it, is strikingly similar to a peculiar hiero-

minative sign affixed to it, consisting of a smooth rectangular stone with a knife over it; but the most singular portion of the circumstance is, that this hieroglyphic, which is read by Egyptologists, Seth, is the symbol of falsehood and error, in contradistinction to the rough (Brute) stone, which is the symbol of faith and truth. The symbol of error was the soft stone, which could be cut; the symbol of truth, the hard stone, on which no tool could be used."

Seth is the true Egyptian name of the god known afterward by the name of Typhon, at one time devoutly worshipped and profoundly venerated in the culminating epoch of the Pharaonic empire, as the monuments of Karnac and Medinet-Abou testify. But in time his worship was overthrown, his shrines desecrated, his name and titles chiselled from the monumental granite, and he himself, from being venerated as the giver of life and blessings to the rulers of Egypt, degraded from his position, treated as a destroying demon, and shunned as the personification of evil. This was not long before the exode of the children of Israel. Seth was the father of Judaeus and Palestinus, is the god of the Semitic tribes who rested on the seventh day, and bears the swarthy complexion, τη χροα πυρρος, of the hated race. Seth is also known by other names in the hieroglyphic legends, among the most striking of which is Bar, that is Bal, known to us in sacred history as the fatal stumbling-block of idolatry to the Jewish people. See Triangle and Square.

Points, The Five. See Chromatic Calendar.

Point within a Circle. An addition to what Dr. Mackey very fully sets forth as an explanation of the term and emblem point within a circle, may be given, by referring to one of the oldest symbols among the Egyptians, and found upon their monuments, which was a circle centred by an A U M, supported by two erect parallel serpents; the circle being expressive of the collective people of the world, protected by the parallel attributes, the Power and Wisdom of the Creator.

The Alpha and Omega, or the W. 22 representing the Egyptian omnipotent God, surrounded by His creation, having for a boundary no other limit than what may come within his boundless scope, his Wisdom and Power. At times this circle is represented by the Ananta (Sanskrit, eternity), a serpent with its tail in its mouth. The parallel serpents were of the cobra species.

It has been suggestively said that the Masonic symbol refers to the circuits or circumambulation of the initiate about the sacred Altar, which supports the three Great Lights as a central point, while the brethren stand in two parallel lines.

Pomme Verte (Green Apple), Order of the. Mentioned by Mackenzie as an androgynous Order, instituted in Germany in 1780, and afterwards introduced into France.

Pooroosh. The spirit or essence of Brahm in the Indian religious system.

Portiforium. A banner like unto the gonfalon, used as an ensign in cathedrals, and borne at the head of religious processions.

Praxeans. The followers of Praxeas in the second century, who proclaimed a unity in God, and that He had suffered upon the cross.

Press, Masonic. The number of the Masonic press throughout the world is small, but the literary ability commands attention. In every nation Masonry has its advocate and newsbearer, in the form of a weekly or semi-monthly chronicle of events, or the more sedate magazine or periodical, sustaining the literature of the Fraternity.

The following schedule is, we regret to say, incomplete:

Priestly Vestments. The High Priest ministered in eight vestments, and the ordinary priest in four,—the tunic, drawers, bonnet, and girdle. To these the High Priest added the breastplate, ephod, robe, and golden plate, and when occasion required the Urim and Thummim.

Prince of Jerusalem, Jewel of. Should be a gold incrustation on a lozenge-shaped piece of mother-of-pearl. Equipoise scales held by hand, sword, five stars, one larger than the other four, and the letters D and Z in Hebrew, one on either side of the scales. The five-pointed crown, within a triangle of gold, has also been used as a jewel of this Sixteenth Degree.

Prince of Wales' Grand Lodge.

About the time of the reconciliation of the two contending Grand Lodges in England, in 1813, they were called, by way of distinction, after their Grand Masters. That of the "Moderns" was called the "Prince of Wales' Grand Lodge," and that of the "Ancients" the "Duke of Kent's Grand Lodge." The titles were used colloquially, and not officially.

Proclus. Known as the successor of Syrianus as the head of the Athenian school. Born in Constantinople, 412, died at Athens, 485. Proclus was a Neo-Platonist, and waged war against the new religion of Christianity, which caused him to be banished from the city; but was subsequently readmitted. His works were chiefly mystical, such as devoting hymns to the sun, Venus, or the poetic muses, and so far were harmless.

Propylæum (also Propylon). The court or vestibule in front of an edifice.

Psaterians. A sect of Arians who maintained, at the Council of Antioch, A. D. 360, that the Son was dissimilar to the Father in will; that He was made from nothing; and that in God, creation and generation were synonymous terms.

Pullen, William Hyde. An eminent and accomplished craftsman of England, who has become renowned among English and American "workmen" for his excellence in the conduct of the forms and varied ceremonies of Masonry.

Punjaub. Freemasonry was founded in Punjaub, India, in 1872, by an ardent Mason, W. Bro. Major Henry Basevi, but whose failing health caused him to forsake his post shortly thereafter, leaving as his successor Major M. Ramsay, who became R. W. D. Grand Master. By last returns received there were 21 Lodges, aggregating 725 members. It is reported authoritatively that in 1879 the institution maintained, clothed, and educated twenty-one children.

Puranas. ("Knowledge.") The textbooks of the worshippers of Vishnu and of Siva, forming, with the Tantras, the basis of the popular creed of the Brahmanical Hindus. There are about 18 Puranas, and as many more minor works, called Upapuranas, all written in Sanskrit, and founded to some extent upon the Mahabharata and Ramayana. Otherwise their date is very uncertain. The followers of Brahmanism number about 175,000,000.

Purrah, The. A society of Sussu negroes exercising similar powers to, and for a somewhat similar purpose as, the Vehmgericht.

Pursuivant. The third and lowest order of heraldic officers. In Masonry, the lowest officer in rank except the Tyler, if he may be termed an officer.

Q.

Q. (Heb. ק, Q or K, Koph.) The seventeenth letter in the English and modern Latin alphabets. In the Phœnician or Ancient Hebrew its form was one circle within another. Its numerical value is 100. The Canaanite signification is ear.

Quadrivium and Trivium. The seven liberal arts and sciences. The Quadrivium, in the language of the schools, were the four lesser arts, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy; while the Trivium were the triple way to eloquence by the study of grammar, logic, and rhetoric.

Qualifications of Candidates. A free man, uninfluenced and unperturbed by Masonic companions, coming of his own will, without expectation of reward or with sinister intention, possessing a favorable impress of the Brotherhood from whatever other source, willing to submit to the forms and usages of the society, imbued with a belief in the Almighty and ever-living God, leading a virtuous life, of lawful age, yet not in dotage, and possessed of moral courage, reasonable intelligence and education. And in the United States not physically blemished by material imperfections of the body.

Quetzalcoatl. The Mexican idea of the Deity of Enlightenment. The spirit-man from whom they received their civilization, and for whose second coming they wait. Him for whom they mistook Cortez, and therefore welcomed him with joy.

R.

R. (Heb. ר, Resh.) The eighteenth letter in the English and other Western alphabets. The word Resh signifies forehead, and in the Phœnician and hieroglyphic character is thus represented. Its numerical value is 200, and the equivalent as a name of God is רַהוּם, Rahum, signifying clemency.

Rainbow, The Most Ancient Order of the. A secret association existing in Moorfields in 1760.

Raising Sheet. A term sometimes given to one of the common properties known to Master Masons.

Ramayana. The great epic of ancient India, deemed a sacred writing by its people, narrating the history of Rama, or Vishnu incarnate, and his wife Siva. It contains about 24,000 verses, in seven books, written in Sanskrit, and is ascribed to Valmiki, who lived about the beginning of the Christian era.

Raphael. (Hebrew interpretation,

"The healing of God.") The title of an officer in a Rose Croix Chapter. The name of the angel, under the Kabbalistical system, that governed the planet Mercury. A messenger.

Red Brother. The sixth and last degree of the Swedenborgian system.

Revelation. An extract from Mackenzie's Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia says upon this subject: "With infinite learning and patience the author of The Book of God, who preserves strict anonymity, has endeavored to show that the work (Apocalypse) was originally revealed to a primordial John, otherwise Oannes, and identical with the first messenger of God to man. This theory is sufficiently remarkable to be mentioned here. The Messengers, twelve in number, are supposed by the author to appear at intervals of 600 years. Thus: 1, Adam, A. M. 3000; 2, Enoch, A. M. 3600; 3, Fohi, A. M. 4200; 4, Brigoo, A. M. 4800; 5, Zarathustra, A. M. 5400; 6, Thoth, A. M. 6000; 7, Amosis or Moses, A. M. 6600; 8, Laotse, A. M. 7200; 9, Jesus, A. M. 7800; 10, Mohammed, A. M. 8400; 11, Chengiz-Khan, A. M. 9000; and, 12, the twelfth messenger yet to be revealed, A. M. 9600." With the aid of this theory, the whole history of the world, down to our own days, is shown to be foretold in the Apocalypse, and although it is difficult to agree with the accomplished writer's conclusions, supported by him with an array of learning and a sincere belief in what is stated, no one with any taste for these studies should be without this wonderful series of books. The same author has published, in two volumes, a revised edition of the Book of Enoch, with a commentary, and he promises to continue, and, if possible, complete his design.

Revels, Master of the. An officer attached to the royal or other eminent household, whose function it was to preside when the members and guests were at refreshment, physical and intellectual, to have charge of the amusements of the court or of the nobleman to whose house he was attached during the twelve Christmas holidays. In Masonic language, the Junior Warden.

Revestiary The wardrobe, or place for keeping sacred vestments. Distinctive costumes in public worship formed a part not only of the Jewish, but of almost all the ancient religions. The revestiary was common to them all. The Master of the Wardrobe became a necessity.

Rite des Elus Coens, ou Prêtres. A system adopted in 1750, but which did not attain its full vigor until twenty-five years thereafter, when Lodges were opened in Paris, Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Toulouse. The devotees of Martinez Pasqualis, the founder, were called Martinistes, and were partly Hermetic and partly Swedenborgian in their teachings. Martinez was a religious man, and based his teachings partly on the Jewish Kabbala and partly on hermetic supernaturalism. The grades were as follows: 1. Apprenti; 2. Compagnon; 3. Maître; 4. Grand Elu; 5. Apprenti Coen; 6. Compagnon Coen; 7. Maître Coen; 8. Grand Architecte; 9. Grand Commandeur.

Rose Croix, Jewel of the. Although there are six well-known Rose Croix degrees, belonging to as many systems, the jewel has invariably remained the same, while the interpretation has somewhat differed. There is here presented the usual jewel of a Rose Croix Knight, and also that of the M. Wise Sov. of an English Chapter.

Rosicrucians, Ancient and Modern. The Rosicrucian Society, instituted in the fourteenth century, was an extraordinary Brotherhood, exciting curiosity and commanding attention and scrutiny. The members delved in abstruse studies: many became Anchorites, and were engrossed in mystic philosophy and theosophy. This strange Fraternity, asserted by some authorities to have been instituted by Roger Bacon near the close of the thirteenth century, filled the world with renown as to their incomprehensible doctrines and presumed abilities. They claimed to be the exponents of the true Kabbala, as embracing theosophy as well as the science of numbers. They were said to delve in strange things and deep mysteries; to be enwrap in the occult sciences, sometimes vulgarly termed the "Black Art;" and in the secrets of magic and sorcery, which are looked upon by the critical eyes of the world as tending to the supernatural, and a class of studies to be avoided.

These mystics, for whom great philanthropy is claimed, and not without reason, are heard of as early as the commencement of the fourteenth century, in the person of Raymond Lully, the renowned scholiast and metaphysical chemist, who proved to be an adept in the doctrines taught at the German seat of hermetic learning in 1302, and who died in 1315. Fidelity and secrecy were the first care of the Brotherhood. They claimed a kinship to the ancient philosophies of Egypt, the Chaldeans, the Magi of Persia, and even the Gymnosophists of India. They were unobtrusive and retiring in the extreme. They were learned in the principles and sciences of chemistry, hermeticism, magnetism, astrology, astronomy, and theosophy, by which they obtained great powers through their discoveries, and aimed at the universal solvent—the Philosopher's Stone—thereby striving to acquire the power of transmuting baser metals into silver and gold, and of indefinitely prolonging human life. As a Fraternity they were distinct from the Kabbalists, Illuminati, and Carbonari, and in this relation they have been largely and unpleasantly misrepresented. Ignorance and prejudice on the part of the learned as to the real purposes of the Rosicrucians, and as to the beneficence of that Fraternity, has wrought them great injustice. Science is infinitely indebted to this Order. The renowned reviver of Oriental literature, John Reuchlin, who died in 1522; the famous philosopher and classic scholar, John Picus di Mirandola, who died in 1494; the celebrated divine and distinguished philosopher, Cornelius Henry Agrippa, who died in 1535; the remarkable chemist and physician, John Baptist Von Helmont, who died in 1644; and the famous physician and philosopher, Robert Fludd, who died in 1637, all attest the power and unquestioned prominence of the famous Brotherhood. It is not the part of wisdom to disdain the Astrological and Hermetic Association of Elias Ashmole, author of the Way to Bliss. All Europe was permeated by this secret organization, and the renown of the Brotherhood was preëminent about the year 1615. Wessel's Fama Fraternitatis, the curious work Secretioris Philosophiæ Consideratis, and Cum Confessione Fraternitatis, by P. A. Gabella, with Fludd's Apologia, the Chemische Hochzeit of Christian Rosenkreuz, by Valentine Andrae; and the endless number of volumes, such as the Fama Ramissa, establish the high rank in which the Brotherhood was held. Its curious, unique, and attractive Rosaic doctrines interested the masses of scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. With the Rosicrucians worldly grandeur faded before intellectual elevation. They were simple in their attire, and passed individually through the world unnoticed and unremarked, save by deeds of benevolence and humanity.

The Modern Society of Rosicrucians was given its present definite form by Robert

Wentworth Little, of England, but a few years ago; it is founded upon the remains or the embers of an old German association which had come under his observation during some of his researches. Brother Little Anglicized it, giving it more perfect system. The purpose of Robert Wentworth Little was to create a literary organization, having in view a base for the collection and deposit of archæological and historical subjects pertaining to Freemasonry, secret societies in general, and interesting provincial matter; to inspire a greater disposition to obtain historical truth and to displace error; to bring to light much in relation to a certain class of scientists and scholars, and the results of their life-labors, that were gradually dying away in the memories of men. To accomplish this end he called about him some of his most prominent English and Scottish Masonic friends inclined to literary pursuits, and they awarded their approval and hearty co-operation. See Rosicrucianism, MACKAY.

Royal Arch Grand Bodies in America. The first meeting of delegates out of which arose the General Grand Chapter was at Boston, October 24, 1797. The convention adjourned to assemble at Hartford, in January, 1798, and it was there the Grand Chapter of the Northern States of America was organized. Again, on the 9th of January, 1799, an adjourned meeting was held, whereat it was resolved to change its name to that of "General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the Northern States of America." On January 9, 1806, the present designation was adopted, to wit: "The General Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masonry for the U. S. of America." New York was determined upon as the place for the first convocation, September, 1812, and the sessions to be made septennial. It failed to meet at the appointed time, but an important convocation was held in New York city on June 6, 1816.

Joseph K. Wheeler, G. Secretary, in his introduction to the Records of Capitular Masonry in the State of Connecticut, says, after mentioning the names of the Chapters represented at the organization of the Grand Chapter in 1798: "In tracing their history it will be observed that all of these Chapters obtained their authority from a Washington Chapter in the city of New York, with the exception of Vanderbroeck, No. 5," chartered at an early date, by the G. Chapter of New York, after which no more Chapters were established by any authority outside the jurisdiction of Connecticut except Lynch Chapter, No. 8, located at Reading, and Weston, which was chartered by the Grand Chapter of N. York, August 23, 1801, which charter was signed by Francis Lynch, H. P. Grand Chapter of R. A. Masons; James Woods, King; and Samuel Clark, Scribe; which was admitted to membership in G. Chapter of Conn., May 19, 1808.

It is of interest here to note that the oldest Chapter in New York State is Ancient, No. 1, whose date of origin is lost, its records up to 1804 having been destroyed by fire, but tradition fixes the year 1763. For years it wielded the powers of a Grand Chapter, and until 1799 was known as the Old Grand Chapter. It granted charters for Chapters in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. In this last named State it issued a charter to Lynch Chapter (see above), which was received into full fellowship by the G. Chapter of Connecticut, although the G. Chapter of New York had been in existence some time before the charter was issued.

On the formation of the Grand Chapter of the State of New York, the numbers 1 and 2 were left vacant for the acceptance of Old and Washington Chapters (which latter was an offspring of the former), who at that time refused to place themselves under its jurisdiction. In 1806, Old Chapter enrolled itself as "Ancient" under the State Grand Body, accepted the number one, and was further honored by having its H. Priest, James Woods, elected Dep. G. H. Priest. Also see Pennsylvania.

Royal Arch Masonry, Massachusetts. A statement of the origin and record of St. Andrew's Chapter in Boston is to trace early Royal Arch Masonry in Massachusetts. The following is extracted from Comp. Thomas Waterman's admirable history of St. Andrew's Royal Arch Chapter, the result of much earnest research: "The first meeting recorded of this Chapter was held on the 28th of August, 1769, and was then styled the Royal Arch Lodge, of which R. W. James Brown was Master." It is presumable this Lodge derived its authority from the Grand Lodge (Ancients) of England, as did that of the same name in Philadelphia, whereby it was authorized to confer the Holy Royal Arch Degree.

Comp. Waterman adds: "It appears by the record that the Degrees of 'Excellent, Super-Excellent, and Royal Arch' were conferred in the Royal Arch Lodge." Winthrop Gray, on April 17, 1770, was elected Master. On the succeeding May 14, "Most Worshipful Joseph Warren, Esq.," was made a Royal Arch Mason. No record appears between March 26, 1773, and March 20, 1789. In an old register-book, dated April 1, 1789, is found "Original members, April 1, 1789, M. E. William McKeen, H. P." The next recorded election, October 21, 1790, gives William McKeen, R. A. Master. "On November 28, 1793, the Degree of Mark Master was connected with the other Degrees conferred in the Chapter." "January 30, 1794, the words 'Royal Arch Chapter' are used for the first time in recording the proceedings of the Chapter."

"The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Massachusetts was organized by delegates from St. Andrew's Chapter, Boston, and King Cyrus' Chapter, Newburyport, who assembled at Masons' Hall, in the Green Dragon Tavern, Boston, on Tuesday, the 13th of March, A. D. 1798."

Ruchiel. In the old Jewish Angelology, the name of the angel who ruled the air and the winds. The angel in charge of one of the four tests in Philosophic Masonry.

Russia, Secret Societies of. First, the Skopzis, founded about 1740, by Seliwanoff, on the ruins of an anterior sect, the Chlysty, which was originated by a peasant named Philippoff, in the seventeenth century. The Skopzis practise self-mutilation and other horrors. They are rich, and abound throughout Russia and in Bulgaria. Second, the Montainists, who declare that they have a "living Christ," a "living Mother of God," a "living Holy Spirit," and twelve "living Apostles." Their ceremonies are peculiar and but little resembling those of Masonry.

S.

S. (Heb. ס, Samech.) The nineteenth letter in the English alphabet. Its numerical value is 60. The sacred application to the Deity is in the name Somech, סמך, Puleius or Firmas. The Hebrew letter Shin (a tooth, from its formation, ש) is of the numerical value of 300.

Saadh. One of a certain Indian sect, who have embraced Christianity; and who in some respects resemble the Quakers in their doctrine and mode of life. Sometimes written saud.

Sabbal. ("The Burthen.") The name of the sixth step of the mystic ladder of Kadosh of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Sacellum. A walled inclosure without roof. An ornamental chapel within a church.

Sacred Law. The first Tables of Stone, or Commandments, which were delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai, are referred to in a preface to the Mishna, bearing this tradition: "God not only delivered the Law to Moses on Mount Sinai, but the explanation of it likewise. When Moses came down from the Mount and entered into his tent, Aaron went to visit him, and Moses acquainted Aaron with the Laws he had received from God, together with the explanation of them. After this Aaron placed himself at the right hand of Moses, and Eleazar and Ithamar (the sons of Aaron) were admitted, to whom Moses repeated what he had just before told to Aaron. These being seated, the one on the right hand, the other on the left hand of Moses, the seventy elders of Israel, who compose the Sanhedrim, came in, and Moses again declared the same laws to them, as he had done before to Aaron and his sons. Lastly, all who pleased of the common people were invited to enter, and Moses instructed them likewise in the same manner as the rest. So that Aaron heard four times what Moses had been taught by God upon Mount Sinai, Eleazar and Ithamar three times, the seventy elders twice, and the people once. Moses afterwards reduced the laws which he had received into writing, but not the explanation of them. These he thought it sufficient to trust to the memories of the above-mentioned persons, who, being perfectly instructed in them, delivered them to their children, and these again to theirs, from age to age."

The Sacred Law is repeated in the ritual of the Fourteenth Degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Sadda. (Persian Saddar, the hundred gates.) A work in the Persian tongue, being a summary of the Avesta, or sacred books.

Sadducees. (Zedukim.) A sect called from its founder Sadoc, who lived about 250 years B. C. They denied the resurrection, a future state, and the existence of angels. The Sadducees are often mentioned in the New Testament, the Talmud, and the Midrash. The tenets of the Sadducees are noticed as contrasted with those of the Pharisees. While Jesus condemned the Sadducees and Pharisees, he is nowhere found criticising the acts, words, or doctrines of the third sect of the Jews, the Essenes; wherefore, it has been strongly favored that Jesus was himself one of the last-named sect, who in many excellent qualities resembled Freemasons.

Sagitta. The keystone of an arch. The abscissa of a curve.

Saint Andrew. Brother of St. Peter and one of the twelve Apostles. He is held in high reverence by the Scotch, Swedes, and Russians. Tradition says he was crucified on a cross thus shaped, X. Orders of knighthood have been established in his name. See Knights of St. Andrew, MACKAY.

Saint Constantine, Order of. Presumed to have been founded by the Emperor Isaac Angelus Comnenus, in 1190.

Sakinat. The Divine presence. The Shekinah, which see.

Sakti. The female energy of Brahma, of Vishnu, or especially of Siva. This lascivious worship was inculcated in the TANTRA ("Instrument of Faith"), a Sanskrit work, found under various forms, and regarded by its numerous Brahmanical and other followers as a "fifth Veda."

Salaam. The name of the Arabic form of salutation, which is by bowing the head and bringing the extended arms from the sides until the thumbs touch, the palms being down.

Saladin. More properly Salah-ed-din, Yussuf ibn Ayub, the Sultan of Egypt and Syria, in the time of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and the founder of the Ayubite dynasty. As the great Moslem hero of the third Crusade, and the beau-ideal of Moslem chivalry, he is one of the most imposing characters presented to us by the history of that period. Born at Takreit, 1137; died at Damascus, 1193. In his manhood he had entered the service of Nouredin. He became Grand Vizier of the Fatimite Calif, and received the title of "the Victorious Prince." At Nouredin's death, Salah-ed-din combated the succession and became the Sultan of Syria and Egypt. For ten succeeding years he was in petty warfare with the Christians, until at Tiberias, in 1187, the Christians were terribly punished for plundering a wealthy caravan on its way to Mecca. The king of Jerusalem, two Grand Masters, and many warriors were taken captive, Jerusalem stormed, and many fortifications reduced. This roused Western Europe; the kings of France and England, with a mighty host, soon made their appearance; they captured Acre in 1191, and Richard Cœur-de-Lion, with an invading force, twice defeated the Sultan, and obtained a treaty in 1192, by which the coast from Jaffa to Tyre was yielded to the Christians.

Salah-ed-din becomes a prominent character in two of the Consistorial degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite, mainly exemplifying the universality of Masonry.

Sandalphon. In the Rabbinical system of Angelology, one of the three angels who receive the prayers of the Israelites and weave crowns from them. Longfellow availed himself of this idea in one of his most beautiful poems.

Sardinia. Freemasonry was introduced into this kingdom in 1739, when Piedmont and Savoy were made a province.

Sastra. One of the sacred books of the Hindu law.

Sat B'hai, Royal Oriental Order of the. Said to have originated in India, and so named after a bird held sacred by the Hindus, whose flight, invariably in sevens, has obtained for the Society the appellation of the "Seven Brethren," hence the name. It embodies seven degrees—Arch Censor, Arch Courier, Arch Minister, Arch Herald, Arch Scribe, Arch Auditor, and Arch Mute. It promises overmuch.

The foregoing figure is termed the Mystery of the Apex.

Saxony. The first Masonic Lodge in Saxony appeared at Dresden, in 1733; within four years thereafter two others had been established in Leipzig and Altenburg. The Grand Body was formed in 1812.

Schor-Laban. ("White Ox," or morally, "Innocence.") The name of the Second step of the Mystic Ladder of Kadosh of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Scorpion. A genus of Arachnida, of numerous species, with an elongated body, but no marked division between the thorax and abdomen. Those of the south of Europe and on the borders of the Mediterranean have six eyes. This reptile, dreaded by the Egyptian, was sacred to the goddess Selk, and was solemnly cursed in all temples since a year.

Scottish Rite, A. A. See Supreme Councils.

Scroll. The written portion of the Jewish law, read at stated periods before the congregation, and preserved in the synagogue with great security.

Sefidd Schamagan. A secret Moslem Society, called also the Candidati, from being clothed in white. They taught that the wicked would be transformed, after death, into beasts, while the good would be reabsorbed into the Divine Creator. The chief was known as the Veiled Prophet.

Sejjin. The Arabic register of all the wicked, also the title of the residence of Eblis.

Selamu Aleikum, Es. The Arabic salutation of "Peace be with you;" which meets with the response "Aleikum es Selaam." These expressions are prominently in use by ancient Arabic associations.

Semelius. An officer in the Sixth Degree of the Modern French Rite, known as the Grand Master of Dispatches.

Senses, Seven. See Man.

Sephora. Wife of Moses, and daughter of Raguel or Jethro, Priest of Midian. Mentioned in the Fourth Degree of the French Rite of Adoption.

Seraphim. (Heb. שֵׂרָפִים.) Singular Seraph, signifying "burning, fiery." Celestial beings in attendance upon Jehovah, mentioned by Isaiah. Similar to the Cherubim, having the human form, face, voice, two hands, and two feet, but six wings, with four of which they cover their face and feet—as a sign of reverence—while with two they fly. Their specific office is to sing the praises of the Holy One, and convey messages from heaven to earth.

Seraphim, Order of. A Swedish Rite, instituted in 1334, revived in 1748.

The number of knights, exclusive of the royal family, was twenty-four.

Setting-Maul. A wooden hammer used by Operative Masons to "set" the stones in their proper positions. It is in Speculative Masonry a symbol, in the Third Degree, reminding us of the death of the builder of the Temple, which is said to have been effected by this instrument. In some Lodges it is very improperly used by the Master as his gavel, from which it totally differs in form and in symbolic signification. The gavel is a symbol of order and decorum; the setting-maul, of death by violence.

Seven. The sun was naturally the great central planet of the ancient seven, and is ever represented as the central light of the seven in the branched candlestick. Of the days of the week one was known as Sol's day, or Sunday, and as the Sun was the son of Saturn, he was ushered in by his father Saturn (or Saturday), whom he superseded. The Jews got their Sabbath from the Babylonians about 700 B. C. (Anc. Faiths, p. 863 ; also see Philo Judaeus, Josephus, and Clement of Alexandria), while Sol's day dates from time immemorial, and was always a sacred one. In a phallic sense, when the sun has been in conjunction with the moon, he only leaves Luna after impregnation, and as Forlong, in his Rivers of Life, expresses it, "the young sun is that faint globe we so often see in the arms of the new moon," which is in gestation with the sun. The occult meaning of the word Mi-mi perhaps is here revealed, as mentioned in 2 Kings xviii. 27, being defined Firewater. Mi is the name of the sun, and as well signifies gold. It is designated in the musical scale, and is also the name of fire in Burmese, Siamese, and cognate tongues, as mentioned by Forlong in treating of the Early Faiths of Western Asia (Vol. II., p. 65).

Next to the sun in beauty and splendor the moon leads all the hosts of heaven. And the Occidental, as well as the Oriental, nations were strongly moved in their imaginations by the awful majesty, the solemn silence, and the grandeur of that brilliant body progressing nightly through the starry vault: from the distant plains of India to ancient Egypt, and even those far-off lands where the Incas ruled, altars were erected to the worship of the Moon. On every seventh day the moon assumed a new phase, which gave rise to festivals to Luna being correspondingly celebrated; the day so set apart was known as Moon-day, or the second day of the week, that following Sun-day. "The Moon, whose phases marked and appointed their holy days" (Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Book I., ch. 28). In the Hebrew, Syrian, Persian, Phœnician, Chaldean, and Saxon, the word Seven signifies full or complete, and every seventh day after the first quarter the moon is complete in its change. In all countries the moon is best known under the beautiful figure of the unveiling Queen of Heaven.

The relative values of Seven in the musical scale and in the ancient planetary formula are as follows:

Si . .	Moon . .	Silver.
Ut . .	Mercury .	Quicksilver.
Re . .	Venus . .	Copper.
Mi . .	Sun . .	Gold.
Fa . .	Mars . .	Iron.
Sol . .	Jupiter. .	Tin.
La . .	Saturn . .	Lead.

The eminent professor of music, Carl Bergstein, in connection herewith, furnishes the information that Guido Aretinus, Monk, in the eleventh century, the great reformer of music, invented the staff, several keys, and the names ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si; they being taken from a prayer to St. John to protect the voice, running thus,

Ut queant laxis	Resonare fibris
Mira gestorum	Fumuli tuorum
Solve polluti	Labii reatum, Sancte Johannes.

The literal translation of which would be rendered:

"For that (or to enable) with expanded breast Thy servants are able to sing the praise of Thy Deeds, forgive the polluted lips the sins uttered."

The syllable ut has since been changed for the more satisfactory do.

In the year 1562 there was printed at Leipzig a work entitled Heptalogium Virgilii Salsburgensis, in honor of the number seven. It consists of seven parts, each embracing seven divisions. In 1624 appeared in London a curious work on the subject of numbers, bearing the following title, "The Secret of Numbers according to Theological, Arithmetical, Geometrical, and Harmonical Computation; drawn, for the better part, out of those Ancients, as well as Neoteriques. Pleasing to read, profitable to understand, opening themselves to the capacities of both learned and unlearned; being no other than a key to lead men to any doctrinal knowledge whatsoever." In the ninth chapter the author has given many notable opinions from learned men, to prove the excellency of the number seven. "First, it neither begets nor is begotten, according to the saying of Philo. Some numbers, indeed, within the compass of ten, beget, but are not begotten; and that is the unarie. Others are begotten, but beget not, as the octonarie. Only the septenaries have a prerogative above them all, neither begets nor is begotten. This is its first divinity or perfection. Secondly, this is a harmonical number, and the well and fountain of that fair and lovely Sigamma, because it includeth within itself all manner of harmony. Thirdly, it is a theological number, consisting of perfection. Fourthly, because of its compositure; for it is compounded of the first two perfect numbers equal and unequal, three and four; for the number two, consisting of repeated unity, which is no number, is not perfect. Now every one of these being excellent of themselves (as hath been demonstrated), how can this number be but far more excellent, consisting of them all, and participating, as it were, of all their excellent virtues?"

Hippocrates says that the septenary number, by its occult virtue, tends to the accomplishment of all things, is the dispenser of life and fountain of all its changes; and, like Shakespeare, he divides the life of man into seven ages. In seven months a child may be born and live, and not before. Anciently a child was not named before seven days, not being accounted fully to have life before that periodical day. The teeth spring out in the seventh month, and are renewed in the seventh year, when infancy is changed into childhood. At thrice seven years the faculties are developed, manhood commences, and we become legally competent to all civil acts; at four times seven man is in full possession of his strength; at five times seven he is fit for the business of the world; at six times seven he becomes grave and wise, or never; at seven times seven he is in his apogee, and from that time he decays; at eight times seven he is in his first climacteric; at nine times seven, or sixty-three, he is in his grand climacteric, or years of danger; and ten times seven, or threescore years and ten, has, by the Royal Prophet, been pronounced the natural period of human life.

Shalal Shalom Abi. (Hebrew, שָׁלֹם אָבִי, Diripuit pacem patri.) A covered word in the Fifteenth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Shalash Esrim. (Heb. שְׁלֹש עָשָׂר.) "Twenty-three," and refers to a day in the month Adar, noted in the Sixteenth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Shaster. ("Instruction.") Any book held more or less sacred among the Hindus, whether included in the Sruti or not. The Great Shasters comprise the Vedas, the Upavedas, and the Vedangas, with their appended works of learning, including the Puranas, the Ramayana, and the Mahabharata.

Shebat. (שֶׁבַת.) The fifth month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding with the months January and February, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Shelum lecka. The password of the Order of Felicity. It is of Arabic root, signifying, "Peace be with you!"

Shemitic. One of the three historical divisions of religion—the other two being the Turanian and the Aryan—and embraces Mosaism, Christianity, the Edaïc Code, and Moslemism.

Shermah, Insect. See Insect Shermah.

Shesha. The seven-headed serpent floating in the cosmical ocean, upon which the throne of Brahma rested.

Shinto. The national worship of the Japanese, and signifies the "path of the gods." It is presumed to be more ancient than the days of King Solomon, and is analogous to sun worship.

Shoulkain. (Heb. שׁוּלְכַיִן, Fimbria possessionis.) Stolkin, mentioned in the Ninth and other Degrees of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Sijel, Al. The recording angel in Islam.

Silent Brotherhood. Dwellers in the priories of Clugny and Hirsan in the eleventh century were placed under rigid discipline as to speech. Those of Clugny were the first to adopt the system of signs for daily intercommunication, which system, by consent or permissal, granted after application through three special messengers from the priory of Hirsan, was adopted by that priory in all its elaborateness, and indeed enlarged and perfected by the well-known Abbot William. The doctrine of a perfect silence in such extensive communities became noteworthy in history. These earnest and devoted men, under strong discipline, as "Conversi or barbati fratres," were encouraged by the abbey of the Middle Ages. Their labors were conducted in companies of ten each, under deans of the monastery, who were in turn instructed by wardens and superiors.

Siloam Inscription. An inscription accidentally discovered in 1880 by a native pupil of Mr. Schick, a German architect, who had long settled in Jerusalem. It is chiselled in the rock that forms the southern wall of the channel which opens out upon the ancient Pool of Siloam, and is partly concealed by the water. The present modern pool includes the older reservoir, supplied with water by an excavated tunnel, 1708 yards long, communicating with the Spring of the Virgin, which is cut through the ridge that forms the southern part of the Temple Hill. The pool is on the opposite side of the ridge, at the mouth of the Tyropœon (Cheesemakers) valley, which is now filled with rubbish, and largely built over.

The inscription is on an artificial tablet in the rock, about nineteen feet from the opening upon the pool. The first intelligible copy was made by Prof. A. H. Sayce, whose admirable little work, called Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments, gives full details. Dr. Guthe, in March, 1881, made a complete fac-simile of the six lines, which read thus:

"(Behold) the excavation! now this is the history of the excavation. While the excavators were still lifting up the pick, each towards his neighbor, and while there were yet three cubits to (excavate, there was heard) the voice of one man calling to his neighbor, for there was an excess in the rock on the right hand (and on the left). And after that on the day of excavating, the excavators had struck pick against pick, one against the other, the waters flowed from the spring to the pool for a distance of 1200 cubits. And (part) of a cubit was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators."

The engineering skill must have been considerable, as the work was tortuous, and yet the excavators met at the middle. There is no date, but the form of the letters show the age to be nearly that of the Moabite stone. Scholars place the date during the reign of Hezekiah. "He made the pool and the aqueduct, and brought the water into the city" (2 Kings xx. 20, Heb. B.). The discovery was an important one. Prof. Sayce deduces the following: "That the modern city of Jerusalem occupies very little of the same ground as the ancient one; the latter stood entirely on the rising ground to the east of the Tyropœon valley, the northern portion of which is at present occupied by the Mosque of Omar, while the southern portion is uninhabited. The Tyropœon valley itself must be the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom, where the idolaters of Jerusalem burnt their children in the fire to Moloch. It must be in the southern cliff of this valley that the tombs of the kings are situated," they being buried under the rubbish with which the valley is filled; and "among this rubbish must be the remains of the city and temple destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. Here, as well as in the now obliterated Valley of the Cheesemakers, probably lie the relics of the dynasty of David."

Hebrew inscriptions of an early date have hitherto long been sought for in vain. Seals and fragmentary inscriptions have heretofore been discovered. Several of these seals have been found in Babylonia and Mesopotamia, and are regarded as memorials of the Jewish exiles; but the Schick discovery gives us a writing certainly as old as the time of Isaiah.

Simorgh. A monstrous griffin, guardian of the Persian mysteries.

Sirat, As or Al. See Al-Sirat.

"Sit Lux et Lux Fuit." A motto frequently used in Masonry, although sometimes written, "Lux Fiat et Lux Fit," signifying, "Let there be light, and there was light;" the strict translation from the Hebrew continues, "And the Lord took care of the light, that it was useful, and he divided the light from the darkness."

Sivan. (יִסְבָּן.) The ninth month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding with the months May and June, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Smaragdine, Tablet of Hermes. The foundation of Hermetic knowledge, with an unknown author. Translated in the Oedipus Aegyptiacus.

Softas. Students in the universities of Islam.

Soli Sanctissimo Sacrum. ("Sacred to the most holy Sun.") Mentioned in the Twenty-eighth Degree, A. A. Scottish Rite.

Solomon's Temple and Serpent Worship. The following description of Solomon's Temple, by J. G. R. Forlong, in his admirable work, Rivers of Life, should not be passed by in a Masonic en-cyclopædia; his experience under many qualifications renders his opinion entitled to weighty thought, yet he reads the Masonic ideal and great central symbol most wofully.

Forlong says the Temple was a poor imitation of the grand Egyptian temple near Edfou, 20 miles south of Thebes. This was 450 feet long and 140 feet broad, or upwards of 14 times the size of the Hebrew shrine, or that one of the Edfou temple halls would swallow up the Jewish temple, which was only 120 feet long, 40 broad, and 60 high; with a tower porch 40x20 feet and 240 high: and further, that it may have been gilt like the Buddhist temples in Burmah. The Holy of Holies was cut off with "golden chains" from the rest of the inner temple, and was 40 feet long; shrouded and bedecked with two hooded serpents, called cherubim, and with chains and garlands, which are serpent symbols. The carvings, with like significancy, were symbolic palm-trees, open flowers, and cherubim, etc. Forlong continues, stating that "according to the Arabic, Syrian, and Alexandrian Bible, the porch should be only 20 cubits high, but let us stand to the orthodox Bible. That the ark-box with its phallic tower is in accordance with the whole of a Sivaik shrine; that the tower-porch is but the Egyptian obelisk, or the Buddhist pillars, or those of Hercules which stood near the Phœnician temple; or the spire of the Christian church. That the pillars Jachin and Boaz are within the tower-porch. That an altar was an ark with a 'mercy-seat,' or place of fire and sacrifice."

The following specifications and drawings are then given:

"No. I. is a Ground Plan of Temple. This has a total length of 120 feet, of which the sanctum is 40 feet, and beyond this, but separate, is the spire and porch, 20 by 40 feet. The Molten Sea (2 Chron. iv. 10) and a staircase appear to be on each side at the entrance, whilst in the porch is placed Jachin and Boaz, the chariot of the sun, etc. I am unable to comprehend the details of windows and doors, upper and lower stories, and partitions, owing to the imperfect and often contradictory terms given in Kings and Chronicles; but in the leading figures no architect can make a mistake. Such temples are especially common amongst the phallic worshippers of southern India. A lofty entrance-porch usually adorns the front; on entering we find phallic poles, with altars for sacrifice, etc.; and in the innermost recess the sanctuary or oracle of the Cultus.

"No. II. is a Block Plan of Site, showing that the shrine is to be placed true east and west, so that the Ark or altar may see the morning sun of the midsummer solstice rise over Mount Olivet, with a ray which bisects the inner and outer walls of the inclosure, which I take to be trapezoidal in form, owing to the course of the cliffs that bound the summit eastwardly.

"No. III. is a Longitudinal Section of Temple. This gives details of spire and position of the phalli, Jachin and Boaz, and determines their height as something between 50 and 60 feet, also the elevation, etc., of the sanctum and oracle. The ark having been early lost, I place a plain maha-deva or stone, which the Rev. T. Wilson tells us was all that existed in the second temple.

"No. IV. is a Front Section of Porch. This shows its appearance from the front, with the relative heights of temple in two stories; but the chroniclers are here very defective, one making the sanctum portion lower than the rest by 10 feet or so."

J. G. R. Forlong adopts two feet to a Solomon's cubit, which is the amount allowed by Sir Isaac Newton, and has been approved by eminent authority. At the entrance of the Temple stood the mighty Baal, represented by chariots with horses yoked, whilst ever around him and in the courts, sacred then to all heaven's other orbs, were his priests, called chemorim, burning incense to the sun, moon, and twelve zodiac constellations. There also sat the temple-women weaving hangings, which symbolized serpents. At the gate of this "holy city of David and Solomon," where lived Joshua, the governor, were the "high places" to phallic-worship, as Hindostan so well knows these, at the entering in of all her cities. In "the valley of the sons of Hinnom" the drums of Tophim were ever sounding, to drown from the ears of loving but fanatical parents the wails and shrieks of their offspring, consigned by ruthless and bloody priests into the red hot stomach of the great brass god Moloch, or else clasped by his horrid arms to his burning frame. See Temple.

Son of Hiram. A mixed tradition states that Aynon was a son of Hiram Abif, and was appointed master of the workmen who hewed the cedars and shaped the timber for the temple, and was recognized for his geometrical knowledge and skill as an engraver.

Soter. An appellation implying "Saviour."

Spencer Manuscript. Bro. Richard Spencer, the celebrated Masonic bibliopolist of London, in the preface to his reprint of The Old Constitutions, published in 1871, says he possesses a Masonic tract of twenty pages, printed in quarto, the title of which is as follows: "The beginning and the first foundation of the most worthy Craft of Masonry, with the charges thereunto belonging. By a deceased Brother, for the benefit of his widow. London: printed for Mrs. Dodd at the Peacock, without Temple Bar, 1739. Price sixpence." This, he thinks, is very like the Constitutions of 1726, printed by him in 1870, and is apparently copied from a similar manuscript. The tract to which Bro. Spencer refers has not been reprinted by him, but the unknown manuscript of which it is supposed to be a copy has been entitled the Spencer Manuscript.

Squarmen. The companies of wrights, slaters, etc., in Scotland, in the seventeenth century, were called "Squarmen." They had ceremonies of initiation, and a word, sign, and grip, like the Masons. Lyon (Hist. of the L. at Edinb., p. 23) says: "The 'Squarmen Word' was given in conclaves of journeymen and apprentices, wrights, slaters, etc., in a ceremony in which the aspirant was blindfolded and otherwise 'prepared;' he was sworn to secrecy, had word, grip, and sign communicated to him, and was afterward invested with a leather apron. The entrance to the apartment, usually a public house, in which the 'brithering' was performed, was guarded, and all who passed had to give the grip. The fees were spent in the entertaining of the brethren present. Like the Masons, the Squarmen admitted non-operatives." In the St. Clair charter of 1628, among the representatives of the Masonic Lodges, we find the signature of "George Liddell, deakin of squarmen and now quartermaistir." This would show that there must have been an intimate connection between the two societies or crafts.

Srutl. ("Revelation.") A collective name of those Sanskrit writings supposed by the Hindus to have been revealed by a deity, and applied at first only to the Vedic Mantras and Brahmanas, but afterward extended to the older Upanishads.

St. Alban's Regulations. The regulations said to have been made by St. Alban for the government of the craft are referred to in the Stone MSS. cited by Anderson, in his second edition (p. 57), and afterwards by Preston. See St. Alban, in body of this work.

St. Anthony. An order taking its rise from the life and habits of St. Anthony, the hermit, who died about 357. His disciples, called Anchorites, near Ethiopia, lived in austerity and solitariness in the desert, until John, emperor of Ethiopia, in 370, created them a religious order of knighthood, and bestowed privileges upon them under the title of St. Anthony, who was made patron of the empire. They established monasteries, adopted a black habit, and wore a blue cross in the shape of a Tau.

The vow embraced chastity, defence of the Christian faith, to guard the empire, obey their superiors, and go to war when and wheresoever commanded. Marriage required a license. There were two classes—combatants and non-combatants—the second class being composed of those too old for military duty. Yet ere they retired they were required to serve three years against Arabian pirates, three against the Turks, and three against the Moors.

The ancient monastery is in the deserts of Thebais, surrounded by an oval wall 500 paces in circumference and 40 feet in height. It is entered by ropes let down from the watch house, the crane being turned by monks. By age, the cells, which are four by five by seven feet, have been reduced from 300 to 40. Advantage had been taken of one of nature's curiosities in obtaining abundant water from a riven rock, which is reached through a subterraneous passage of 50 paces, extending beyond the walls. In France, Italy, and Spain there are ecclesiastical and military organizations styled Knights of St. Anthony, who wear a plain cross, the principals a double cross. The chief seat is at Vienna. In the abbey rest the remains of St. Anthony.

St. John, the Evangelist. The elaborate and expressive coat-of-arms of the German Masons, as taken from an authentic old drawing (Heideloff), A. D. 1515, a representation of which will be found in the third volume of Gould's History, p. 145, tends to show that Dr. Mackey had overlooked the same (see p. 684) when writing as to the age when the Evangelist was known to Masonry, if the German Masons of 1515 were legitimately our forefathers in the Fraternity. The coat-of-arms has encrusted on a shield a ball, toward the centre of which one point of each of four compasses is directed, thus:

this shield is surmounted by an ornamental breastplate and scroll-work of leaves, at the superior portion of which, from a ducal crown, issues an eagle with uplifted wings and a pen in its beak; in a circle surrounding the head are the words "S. Johannes Evangelista."

"Stellato Sedet Solo." ("He sits on his starry throne.") A symbolic expression in the Twenty-eighth Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Strasburg, Constitutions of. On April 25, 1459, nineteen Bauhütten, or Lodges, in Southern and Central Germany met at Ratisbon, and adopted regulations for the government of the German stonemasons. Another meeting was held shortly afterwards at Strasburg, where these statutes were definitively adopted and promulgated, under the title of Ordnung der Steinmetzen Strasburg, or "Constitutions of the Stonemasons of Strasburg." They from time to time underwent many alterations, and were confirmed by Maximilian I. in 1498, and subsequently by many succeeding emperors. This old document has several times been printed; in 1810, by Krause, in his drei ältesten kunsterkunden der Freimaurerbruderschaft; in 1819, by Heldmann, in die drei ältesten geschichtlichen Denkmale der deutschen Freimaurerbruderschaft; in 1844, by Heidehoff, in his Bauhütte des Mittelalters in ihrer wahren Bedeutung; Findel also, in 1866, inserted portions of it in his Geschichte der Freimaurerei, which work has been ably translated into English by Bro. D. Murray Lyon.

The invocation with which these Constitutions commence is different from that of the English Constitutions. The latter begin thus: "The might of the Father of Heaven, with the wisdom of the blessed Son, through the grace of God and goodness of the Holy Ghost, that be three persons in one Godhead, be with us," etc. The Strasburg Constitutions begin: "In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and of the gracious Mother Mary, and also her blessed servants, the four holy crowned ones of everlasting memory," etc. The reference to the Virgin Mary and to the four crowned martyrs is found in none of the English Constitutions except the oldest of them, the Halliwell MS. But Kloss has compared the Strasburg and the English statutes, and shown the great similarity in many of the regulations of both. (Muckey.)

Strict Trial. See Vouching, in the body of this work.

Stukely, Dr. In accordance with the Doctor's diary, he "was made a Mason, January 6, 1721, at the Salutation Tavern, Tavistock street, London, with Mr. Collins and Captain Rowe, who made the famous diving engine." The Doctor adds: "I was the first person in London made a Freemason in that city for many years. We had great difficulty to find members enough to perform the ceremony. Immediately upon that it took a run, and ran itself out of breath through the folly of its members." The Stukely papers containing the Doctor's diary are of continuous interest; and according to Rev. W. C. Lukis, P. M., F. S. A., "Pain (or Payne) had been re-elected Grand Master in 1720, and Dr. Desaguliers was the Immediate Past Grand Master." The last mentioned Brother pronouncing the Oration on June 24, 1721, at Stationers' Hall: on the following St. John's Day (Evangelist), December 27, 1721, "We met at the Fountain Tavern, Strand, and by consent of the Grand Master present, Dr. Beal constituted a new Lodge, where I was chosen Master." A trite remark of Dr. Stukely as to symbolism, was: "The first learning of the world consisted chiefly of symbols, the wisdom of the Chaldeans, Phenicians, Egyptians, Jews, of Zoroaster, Sancho-niathon, Pherecydes, Syrus, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, of all the ancients that have come to our hand, is symbolic."

Sun of Mercy, Society of the. Of this Society little is known, but Antoine Joseph Pernetty, the presumed author of the 28th Degree, A. A. Scottish Rite, became a devotee to it, and induced Swedenborg to become a member. Its central point appears to have been Avignon and Montpellier; and its nature Hermetic.

Supreme Councils, A. A. Scottish Rite. These Councils are organized in almost every country of the world, a number being under royal patronage, and in many nations are the governing power over all existing Masonry. A synoptical history of all the Supreme Councils that have ever existed, with the manner of their formation in chronological order, is published in the Proceedings of the Supreme Council for the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction for 1881, pages 123-150. From this article is taken the following list, giving the Supreme Councils which have received general recognition:

Supreme Council.	Grand Commander.	Orient.	Constituted.
Southern Jur. U. S. A.	Albert Pike	Charleston	May 31, 1801.
France	Louis Proal	Paris	Sept. 22, 1804.
Spain	Manuel de Llanos y Persi	Madrid	July 4, 1811.
Northern Jur. U. S. A.	Henry L. Palmer	Boston	Aug. 5, 1813.
Belgium	Pierre Vanhumbeek	Bruxelles	Mar. 11, 1817.
Ireland	John F. Townshend	Dublin	June 11, 1826.
Brazil	Dr. F. Jose Cardoza	Lavradio 1829.
Peru	Fr. Javier Mariatgui	Lima	Nov. 2, 1830.
New Granada	Juan M. Grau	Cartagena 1833.
England, Wales, etc.	Earl of Lathom	London	Oct. 26, 1845.
Scotland	Edinburgh 1846.
Uruguay	Carlos de Castro	Montevideo 1856.
Argentine Republic	Domingo F. Sarmiento	Buenos Ayres	Sept. 13, 1858.
Turin, of Italy	Dr. Timoteo Riboli	Turin 1858.
Colon (Cuba)	Juan I. Zuazo	Havana	Mar. 25, 1859.
Mexico	Carlos Pacheco	Mexico	April 28, 1868.
Portugal	A. S. De Castro Guedes	Lisbon	Oct. 30, 1869.
Chili	J. De D. M. Benevente	Valparaiso	May 11, 1870.
Central America	Manuel A. Bonillo	San José	Nov. 27, 1870.
Greece	Prince Rhodokanakis	Athens	July 24, 1872.
Switzerland	Lausanne	Mar. 30, 1873.
Canada	William H. Hutton	Hamilton	Oct. 16, 1874.
Egypt	S. A. Zola	Cairo 1878.
Tunis	Gustav Desmons	Tunis	May 11, 1880.

The following Supreme Councils have been formed, but have not received formal recognition and the courtesy of an exchange of representation: Dominican Republic, Florence, Hungary, Luxembourg, Naples, Palermo, Rome, Turkey, and Venezuela. The number of these Supreme Bodies accomplishes 33.

On the 22d of September, 1875, a congress of the various Supreme Councils was convened at Lausanne, Switzerland, to consider such matters as might then and there be submitted for consideration and united action, and be deemed for the general benefit of the Rite. Much speculation and lack of confidence was the result among many of the invited participants lest they might be committed by uniting in the conference. The Congress, however, was held, and a declaration of principles set forth. There was also stipulated and agreed upon a treaty, involving highly important measures, embraced within 23 articles, which was concluded September 22, 1875. "The intimate alliance and confederation of the contracting Masonic powers extended and extends under their auspices to all the subordinates and to all true and faithful Masons of their respective jurisdictions." "Whoever may have illegitimately and irregularly received any Degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite can nowhere enjoy the prerogatives of a Freemason until he has been lawfully healed by the regular Supreme Council of his own country." The confederated powers again recognized and proclaimed as Grand Constitutions of the A. A. Scottish Rite, the constitutions and statutes adopted May 1, 1876, with the modifications and "Tiler" adopted by the Congress of Lausanne, the 22d of September, 1875.

The declaration and articles were signed by representatives of eighteen Supreme Councils, who recognized the territorial jurisdictions of the following Supreme Councils, to wit:

Northern Jur., U. S.	Southern Jur., U. S.
Central America,	England,
Belgium,	Canada,
Chili,	Colon,
Scotland,	U. S. of Colombia,
France,	Greece,
Hungary,	Ireland,
Italy,	Mexico,
Peru,	Portugal,
Argentine Republic,	Switzerland,
Uruguay.	Venezuela.

The same delegates, by virtue of the plenary powers they held, and by which they were justified, promised, for their principals, to maintain and defend with all their power, to preserve, and cause to be observed and respected, not only the territorial jurisdiction of the Confederated Supreme Councils represented in the said Congress at Lausanne, and the parties therein contracting, but also the territorial jurisdiction of the other Supreme Councils named in the foregoing table.

It is not possible to give statistics as to the number of the A. A. Scottish Rite Masons in the world, but calculating those, of whatever degree, who are governed by Supreme Councils in the different nations, it is but reasonable to presume one-half of the entire Fraternity is of that Rite, and as a matter of extensiveness, it is par excellence the Universal Rite. In many nations there is no other Rite known, and therein it confers all the degrees of its system, including the first three. Among the English speaking Masons, it builds its structure upon the York or the American system of three degrees.

In the United States the number of this Rite, enrolled and unenrolled, will approximate twenty-five thousand in the two Jurisdictions. Its organizations are to be found in every prominent city and many towns, and in numerous instances possessing and occupying temples built specially to accommodate its own peculiar forms, elegant of structure and in appointments, and of great financial value.

The progress of this Rite in the last half century has been most remarkable, and its future appears without a cloud.

Sword, Revolving. With the Cherubim, Yahveh stationed at the gate of Eden, "to keep the way of the tree of Life," the lahat ha'hereb hammitthappeketh, "The revolving phenomenon of the curved sword," or "the flaming blade of the sword which turns." There were two cherubim, one at each side of the gate. These angels, or winged bulls, did not hold the weapon in their hands, but it was apart, separate from them. The lahat ha'hereb was endowed with proper motion, or turned upon itself. There was but one, and presumably it was between the cherubim, suspended at a certain height in the air. Prof. Lenormant, in speaking of this terrible weapon, states, that "the circumference, which was turned fully upon the spectator, could have been full of eyes all around, and that when the prophet says 'that they had a circumference and a height that were dreadful,' the second dimension refers to the breadth of their rims," and when advancing with the cherubim against the irreverent intruder at the forbidden gate, it would strike and cut him in pieces as soon as it should graze him. The symbolism of this instrument has been fixed by Obry as the techakra of India, which is a disk with sharp edges, hollow at the centre, which is flung horizontally, after having been whirled around the fingers. "A weapon for slinging, shaped like a disk, moving horizontally with a gyratory motion, like that of a waterspout, having a hollow centre, that the tips of the fingers can pass through, whence seven divergent rays issue toward a circumference, about which are studded fifty sharp points." See Cherubim.

Syrian Rite. A religious sect which had its origin in Syria, and which was anciently comprehended in the patriarchates of Antioch and of Jerusalem. It was an exceedingly flourishing system. Before the end of the fourth century it numbered 119 distinct sees, with a population of several millions. The liturgy is known as the Liturgy of St. James.

Systyle. An arrangement of columns in which the intercolumniation is equal to the diameter of the column.

T. The twentieth letter of the English alphabet, and the twenty-second and last of the Hebrew. As a symbol, it is conspicuous in Masonry. Its numerical value as Ṭ, Teth, is 9, but as Ṭ, Thau, it is 400. See Tau, MACKEY.

Tabaor. Toffet. Edom. Three obsolete names which are sometimes given to the three Elect in the Eleventh degree in the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Tablets, Engraved. A designation frequently used in the A. A. Scottish Rite for the book of minutes or record; as in the Rose Croix Chapter is used the term "engraved columns."

Talith. An oblong shawl worn over the head or shoulders, named, from its having four corners, the arba canphoth. It is also called tsitsith, from the fringes on which its holiness depends. The talith is made of wool or camel's hair. The wool fringe is carefully shorn and specially spun. Four threads, one of which must be blue, are passed through eyelet holes made in the four corners. The threads being double make eight. Seven are of equal length; the eighth must twist five times round the rest and be tied into five knots, and yet remain equal in length to the other seven. The five knots and eight threads make thirteen, which, with the value of the Hebrew word tsitsith, 600, accomplishes 613, the number of precepts of the moral law, and which is the number of letters in Hebrew composing the decalogue. 613 represents 248 positive precepts, or members of the human body, and 365 negative precepts, or number of human veins. Jesus of Nazareth wore the tsitsith: "And behold a woman . . . came behind him and touched the hem of his garment" (Matt. ix. 20); and he rebuked the Pharisees for their ostentation in enlarging the "borders" (κράσπεδα, fringes) of their garments. (Matt. xxiii. 5.)

Taljahad. Rendered in Hebrew thus: מַלְאָכֵי, "Angel of Water," and found in the Twenty-ninth degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite ritual.

Tammuz. זמנ. The tenth month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding to the months June and July, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Tanga-Tango. A Peruvian triune symbol, signifying "one in three and three in one."

Tchandalas. Mentioned in the Institutes of Manu as a class of pariahs, or the lowest in society, but are referred to as the inventors of brick for building purposes, as is attested by Vina-Snati and Veda Vyasa. In the course of time they were banished from the towns, the rites of burial, and the use of rice, water, and fire. They finally emigrated, and became the progenitors of great nations.

Tebeth. טבת. The fourth month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding to the months December and January, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Telamones. See Caryatides.

Templar Statistics. See Statistics of the Order of the Temple.

Temple of Solomon. Plan of, according to the Talmud, Josephus (Antiquities, xv., xi. 5, etc.), and the best Jewish authorities. See The Talmud, by Joseph Barclay, LL.D., published in London, 1878, John Murray, Albemarle Street.

The Temple was located toward and along the north of an extensive square, walled and triple colonnaded. The Royal Tyropeon Bridge, being at the south-west approach, led into the "Mountain of the House," or Court of the Gentiles, which was a large open space for gathering of the people and procuring offerings. On either side of the openings through the wall round the courts were fixed the "Slabs of Warning," one of which was discovered in Jerusalem in 1871, and contains these words: "No stranger is allowed to pass within the balustrade round the Temple and enclosure. If found, the offender must take the consequence, and his death will follow." (For general description of Temple of Solomon, see ante, pages 796-8.)

No man was permitted to be irreverent opposite the eastern gate of the Temple, for it is opposite the Holy of Holies. No man was to go on the "Mountain of the House" with his staff, shoes, or purse, nor with dust on his feet, nor is he to spit at all. It was also directed that every man should greet his friend in THE NAME; as it is said: "And behold Boaz came from Bethlehem, and said unto the reapers, 'The LORD be with you;' and they answered him, 'The LORD bless thee.'"

The priests guarded the Sanctuary in three places: in the Houses of Abtinas, Nitzus, and Moked; the younger priests in the upper chambers.

The Temple services were arranged by a council of fourteen—the High Priest, his deputy the Suffragan, and twelve priests.

REFERENCES TO PLAN OF TEMPLE.

1. Wall round courts, with 13 openings.
2. The Chel; space between smaller wall and wall of court.
3. Shops.
4. Small Sanhedrin. Contained 3 rows of 23 men each.
5. Eastern Gate. The chief gate, called "Beautiful." (Acts iii. 2.)
6. Court of Women, with chests at the entrances for offerings.
7. Chamber of Wood, arranged for each day's use.
8. Chamber of Nazarites, for boiling peace-offerings and burning hair.
9. Chamber of Lepers, where they shaved their hair.
10. Chamber of Oil, for the candlestick and flour-offerings.
11. Second Small Sanhedrin. Contained 3 rows of 23 men each.
12. Chambers of Music, under the court, for instruments and vocal practice.
13. Gate of Nicanor, approached by 15 steps.
14. Court of Israel. Length, 187 cubits; breadth, 11 cubits.
15. Chambers of Vestments and Spicery.
16. Place of Blessing. A landing of 3 steps.
17. Chambers for salt, water, and skins.
18. Slaughter-house.
19. Tables of Cleansing.
20. Altar of Burnt-offerings.

21. The Ascent to the Altar, the which it was not permitted to touch.

22. Court of Priests. Length, 135 cubits; breadth, 11 cubits.

23. Place of Ashes.

24. The Laver and its pedestal.

25. The Draw-well.

26. Steps to the Porch; $3 + 1 + 2 + 4 + 1 = 11$ steps to the Porch.

27. Two Pillars—Jachin and Boaz.

28. The Porch. In length 70 cubits, in breadth 11 cubits.

29. Chambers of Broken Knives.

30. Veil at entrance of Porch, 20 by 40 cubits.

31. Unoccupied space, called "Circumference" and "The Descent of Rain-water."

32. Chambers round Sanctuary; 3 tiers, one above the other; total, 38.

33. The Middle Chamber, but not so specially designated. Two tiers high.

34. Door of Sanctuary; 10 by 20 cubits.

35. Golden Altar of Incense.

36. Candlestick.

37. Golden Table of Shewbread.

38. Two golden Pedestals, on which to temporarily place the blood of the bullock and goat.

39. Two Veils, within the traksin, or partition-wall, which was a cubit in width. The veils did not touch each other by three hand-breadths; hence the separation of the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies.

40. Holy of Holies; 20 by 20 cubits.

41. Ark, resting on Stone of Foundation.

42. Chamber of Moked (Burning), and chambers for sheep, baking, etc.

43. House of Nitzus, for the guards.

44. Gates.

45. Chambers for supply of water and wood.

46. Chamber of Hewn Stone, for Great Sanhedrin; 3 rows of 23 men each.

47. Water-gate for the Altar.

48. Upper Chamber of Abtinas. A watch-chamber.

Ten Expressions. Using, as do the Rabbins, the expression, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," as one, we find nine other expressions in the first chapter of Genesis in which "God said;" thus making ten expressions by which the world was created. There were ten generations from Adam to Noah, to show that God was long-suffering before he deluged the earth. For a similar reason, says the Talmud, there were ten generations from Noah to Abraham, until the latter "took the reward of them all." Abraham was proved with ten trials. Ten miracles were wrought for the children of Israel in Egypt, and ten at the Red Sea. Ten plagues afflicted the Egyptians in Egypt, and ten at the Red Sea. And ten miracles were wrought in the Holy Temple. See Ten, p. 805.

Tensio-Dai-Sin. A deity held in adoration by the Japanese; the zodiacal sun, with its twelve constellations, as the representative of the god and his twelve apostles. This omnific being, like the zodiacal light, of triangular form, seen only in the evening after twilight and in the morning before dawn, and whose nature is unknown, is possessed of ineffable attributes, inexpressible and unutterable, with a supreme power to overcome eruptions of nature and the elements. Like unto Masonry, there are four periods of festival, to wit, in the third, fifth, seventh, and ninth of the third, fifth, seventh, and ninth months. The initiates are called Jammabos, and wear aurora-colored robes, like unto the light of the dawn of day.

Ternary Allusions. Some of the well-considered and beautiful thoughts of Rev. George Oliver on Ternary Allusions as applicable to the construction of the Temple services of Solomon are the three principal religious festivals—the Feast of Passover, of Pentecost, and of Tabernacles. The Camp was threefold. The Tabernacle, with its precinct, was called “The Camp of the Divine Majesty;” the next, “The Camp of Levi, or little host of the Lord;” and the largest, “The Camp of Israel, or the great host.” The tribes were marshalled in subdivisions of three, each being designated by a banner containing one of the cherubic forms of the Deity. The Temple, in like manner, had three divisions and three symbolical references—historical, mystical, and moral. The golden candlestick had twice three branches, each containing three bowls, knobs, and flowers. In the Sanctuary were three sacred utensils—the candlestick, the table of shewbread, and the altar of incense; and three hallowed articles were deposited in the Ark of the Covenant—the tables of the law, the rod of Aaron, and the pot of manna. There were three orders of priests and Levites, and the High Priest was distinguished by a triple crown.

Three allusions may be observed through the whole of Jewish history. Thus, Elijah raised the widow's son by stretching himself upon the child three times. Samaria sustained a siege of three years. Some of the kings of Israel and Judah reigned three years, some three months, some three days. Rehoboam served God three years before he apostated. The Jews fasted three days and three nights, by command of Esther, before their triumph over Haman. Their sacred writings had three grand divisions—the law, the prophets, and the psalms.

In the Masonic system there were three Temples—those of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod. The Jews speak of two that have been, and believe in one, as described by Ezekiel the Prophet, yet to come. The Rabbis say: “The third Temple we hope and look for.” See Three, MACKEY.

Tetradites. Believers in the occult powers of the numeral four, and in a Godhead of four persons in lieu of three. In this connection, the following figure is worthy of examination, it being a star of five points inclosing the three letters of the Ineffable Name, but forming the Tetragrammaton, the Shem Hamphorash. This figure has been claimed to represent the God Head.

Theopaschites. Followers of Peter the Fuller, who flourished in the fifth century, and believed in the crucifixion of all three of the Godhead.

Theoricus. The second grade of the “First Order” of the Society of Rosicrucians. See Rosicrucian.

Therlog. The 613 precepts into which the Jews divided the Mosaic law. Thus the Hebrew letters תרי"ג numerically express 613. See description of Talith.

Thirteen, The. A Parisian society claiming to exercise an occult influence during the First Empire. A society of growing proportions in the United States, intended to confound and uproot superstition, with an indirect reference to Arthur's Round Table and the Judas of infamy.

Thokath. תוקא, strength. An expression known to the Brethren of the Scottish Rite in the Twelfth degree.

Thomists. An ancient Christian church in Malabar, said to have been founded by St. Thomas.

Thor, or Thorr, contracted from Thonar, and sometimes known as Donar. This deity presided over the mischievous spirits in the elements, and was the son of Odin and Freyia. These three were known in mythology as the triune deity—the Father, Son, and Spirit. Thor's great weapon of destruction or force was the Mjolner, the hammer or mallet, which had the marvelous property of invariably returning to its owner after having been launched upon its mission, and having performed its work of destruction.

Three Fires. Guardians of the Sixty-seventh degree of the Modern Rite of Memphis.

Three-Fold Cord. A triple cord whose strands are of different colors; it is used in several rites as an instructive symbol. See Zennaar.

Three Sacred Utensils. These were the vessels of the Tabernacle as to which the Rev. Joseph Barclay, LL.D., makes the following quotation: "Rabbi José, son of Rabbi Judah, said a fiery ark, and a fiery table, and a fiery candlestick descended from heaven. And Moses saw them, and made according to their similitude;" and thus comments: "They also think that the Ark of the Covenant is concealed in a chamber under the Temple Enclosure, and that it and all the holy vessels will be found at the coming of the Messiah." The Apocrypha, however, informs us that Jeremiah laid the Tabernacle, and the Ark, and the Altar of Incense in a "hollow cave, in the mountain, where Moses climbed up and saw the heritage of God. And the place shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people again together, and receive them into Mercy." (2 Mac. ii. 4-7.) The sacred vessels, which were taken to Rome after the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70, and are now seen sculptured on the Arch of Titus, were carried off to Africa by the Vandals under Genseric. Belisarius took them to Constantinople in A. D. 520. They were afterward sent back to Jerusalem, and thence they are supposed to have been carried to Persia, when Chosroes plundered the Holy City, in June, 614.

Thugs. A Hindoo association that offered human sacrifices to their divinity Kali. It was dreaded for its violence and the fierceness of its members, who were termed either Stranglers or Aspirants.

Thurible. From Turis, frankincense; Ivos, a sacrifice. A metallic censer for burning incense. It is of various forms, but generally in that of an ornamental cup suspended by chains, whereby the Thurifer keeps the incense burning and diffuses the perfume.

Thurifer. The bearer of the thurible, or censer, prepared with frankincense, and used by the Romish Church at Mass and other ceremonials; as also in the Philosophic Degrees of Masonry.

Thursday. The fifth day of the week. So called from its being originally consecrated to Thor, or the Icelandic Thorr, the god of thunder, answering to the Jove of the Romans.

Tiluk. The sacred impress made upon the forehead of the Brahman, like unto the Tau to the Hebrew, or the cross to the Christian.

Tisri. תִּשְׂרִי. The first month of the Hebrew civil year, and corresponding to the months of September and October, beginning with the new moon of the former.

Titan of the Caucasus. The Fifty-third degree of the Memphis Rite.

Topes. Pillars, also signifying towers and tumuli. This is a corruption of the Sanskrit word Stoopas, meaning mounds, heaps, karns. The Topes of the Karli temple, a Buddhist shrine, which may be seen up the Western Ghats from Bombay to Poona, are presumed to be Phallic pillars placed in front, precisely as Solomon placed his Jachin and Boaz. Some travellers state that only one of these pillars stands at present. The pillars were shaft plain, with a capital carrying four lions, representing power and cat-like salacious-ness. Between these pillars may be seen the great window which lights all the Temple, arched in the form of a horse-shoe, which is the Isian head-dress and Maiya's holy sign, and after which the Roman Church adopts one of Mary's favorite head-dresses. It is the "crown of Venus Urania."

These pillars are prominent features of Buddhist sacred buildings, and when composed of a single stone are called a Lat. They are frequently ornamented with honeysuckles. The oldest monument hitherto discovered in India is a group of these monoliths set up by Asoka in the middle of the third century B. C. They were all alike in form, inscribed with four short edicts containing the creed and principal doctrines of Buddhism. These pillars stood originally in front of some sacred buildings which have perished; they are polished, 45 feet each in height, and surmounted by lions. The Thuparamya Tope, in Ceylon, has 184 handsome monoliths, 26 feet in height, round the centre holy mound.

Torchbearer. The fifteenth officer in the High Council of the Society of Rosierucians; also known as an officer in the Appendant Order of the Holy Sepulchre. One who bears a torch.

Trappists, Order of Religious.

An order founded by the devotee of secret organizations, Count La Perche, in 1140.

Tredie. The king highest in rank in the Scandinavian Mysteries.

Tree Alphabet. There are alphabets used among the Persians and Arabs at the present day as secret ciphers, which it can scarcely be doubted were original, and ages ago adopted and recognized as the ordinary business mode of communication among men. Among these the Tree Alphabet is the most common. The Philosopher Dioscorides wrote several works on the subject of trees and herbs, and made prominent the secret characters of this alphabet, which became known by his name, and was adopted and used by others.

The characters were distinguishable by the number of branches on either side of the tree; thus, the TH is recognizable from the SH, notwithstanding each has three limbs on the left hand of the stem or trunk, by the one having six and the other seven branches on the right hand side.

As an example, here are nine of the mystic characters and their relative values:

The characters in the lower line given above are of relative value, and known as the Alphabet of Hermes or Mercury.

Tree Worship. The important position which this peculiar faith occupied among the peoples in the earliest ages of the world is apt to be overlooked in the multitude of succeeding beliefs, to which it gave many of its forms and ceremonies, and with which it became materially blended. In fact, Tree and Serpent Worship were combined almost at their inception. So prominent a position does Tree Worship take in the opinion of Fergusson, in his absorbing work on Tree and Serpent Worship, that he designates the Tree as the first of Faiths; and adds that "long before the Theban gods existed, Tree and Serpent Faiths flourished. The Methidy tree was brought into the later religion, to shade with holy reverence the tomb of Osiris; the Sycamore was holy to Netpe, and the Persea to Athor, whilst the Tamarisk played an important part in all the rites and ceremonies of Osiris and Isis; and all who are orthodox will acknowledge that Abram seemed to consider that he could not worship his Jove till he had planted his grove and digged a well (Gen. xxi. 33). His Oak or 'Terebinth,' or turpentine tree, on the plains of Mamre, was commonly worshipped till the fourth century A. C., and it is revered by Jews to the present hour." And again: "That long ere Buddha or his saints were represented by images and adored, long ere the caves and temples of that faith had sanctuaries for holy relics, the first actual symbol-worship he can trace is that of the Bo tree, which he describes as upon a bas-relief in a cave called the Jodea-Gopa (Katak, Bengal), proving how early that worship was introduced, and how pre-eminent it was among the Buddhists of those days;" and says J. G. R. Forlong, in his Rivers of Life, or Faiths of Man, "before Vedic days; and can be found in almost every cave and temple allied to the Phallic faith as certainly as can be found ever standing at the entrance of these 'Houses of God' the Phallic pillar or pillars. It is the old story whether we turn to Solomon's temple, 1000 B. C., or to the Karli Buddhist temples, which gaze down upon us from Bombay to Poona, and which date from about the Christian era."

The Bael tree, as a representative of the triad and monad, was always offered at Lingam worship, and the god was commonly to be found under an umbrageous Bael.

All nations, Aryans in particular, considered tree planting a sacred duty. The grand old trees became centres of life and of great traditions, and the character of the foliage had its symbolic meanings.

At the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, at the autumnal harvest, Jews are ordered to hang boughs of trees, laden with fruit, round the borders of their booths, also boughs of barren trees. The worshippers go to the synagogue carrying in their right hand one palm branch, three myrtles, and two willows, all tied together; and in the left hand a citron branch with fruit on it. These they make touch each other, and wave to the east, then south, then west, and then north: this is termed Hosana. On the seventh day of the Feast, all save the willow bough must be laid aside.

The Palm, as a tree, yields more to man than any other class of trees. Nineveh shows the Palm surrounded by winged deities holding the pine cone—symbol of life, which there takes the place of the Crux Ansata. The Phoenix resting on the Palm signifies "Resurrection to eternal life." The four evangelists are depicted in "an evangelum," in the library of the British Museum, as all looking up to the Palm tree. Christians, for a similar ideal, erected a cross-bar, and placed an Alpha and an Omega on it.

PALM TREE WITH CROSS.

At Najran, in Yemen, Arabia, Sir William Ouseley describes the most perfect tree worship as still existing close to the city. The tree is the Palm or Sacred date. The Palm has always borne a most important part in all the faiths of the world down to the present day. The Jews gave the Palm a distinguished place in architecture. The tree and its lotus top, says Kitto, took the place of the Egyptian column on Solomon's famous phalli, the Jachin and Boaz.

The two trees in Genesis were those of Life and Knowledge, and were probably drawn from the Egyptian and Zoroastrian stories. But no further reference is taken in the Bible of the "Tree of Knowledge" after Genesis, but to that of Life, or the "Tree which gives Life," as in the Apocalypse ii. 7. This is also the Eastern name and significance of the Lingam or Pillar; and when covered with carved inscriptions, the Toth or Pillar in Egypt became known as the "Tree of Knowledge."

Triangle and Square. As the Delta was the initial letter of Deity with the ancients, so its synonym is among modern nations. It is a type of the Eternal, the All-Powerful, the Self-Existent.

The material world is typified by the "square" as passive matter, in opposition to force symbolized by the triangle.

The Square is also an emblem of humanity, as the Delta or Triangle typifies Deity.

The Delta, Triangle, and Compasses are essentially the same. The raising one point, and then another, signifies that the divine or higher portion of our nature should increase in power, and control the baser tendencies. This is the real, the practical "journey toward the East."

The interlacing triangles or deltas symbolize the union of the two principles or forces, the active and passive, male and female, pervading the universe. (1.)

The two triangles, one white and the other black, interlacing, typify the mingling of the two apparent powers in nature, darkness and light, error and truth, ignorance and wisdom, evil and good, throughout human life. (2.)

The triangle and square together form the pyramid (3.), as seen in the Entered Apprentice's apron. In this combination the pyramid is the metaphor for unity of matter and force, as well as the oneness of man and God. The numbers 3, 5, 7, 9, have their places in the parts and points of the square and triangle when in pyramidal form, and imply Perfection. See Pointed Cubical Stone.

Trifels. The name of the ruined castle, four miles from Madenburg, on a mountain slope, where Sir Richard Cœur de Lion was a prisoner for more than a year, by decree of the emperor Henry VI., and until his liberation by the faithful Blondel. Naught remains but thirty feet of the tower and some fragments of wall. It is recorded that there may be seen engraved deep in the window-stone of the tower this mark: the passion cross standing upon the square with an apex upward, and having upon it an inverted TAU of proportionate size at an inclination of about forty-nine degrees.

Trilithon. Three stones, two of which are placed parallel on their ends, and crossed by the third at the top.

THE TRILITHON AT ST. MICHAEL'S MOUNT, LAND'S END.

Trinitarians, Order of. An androgynous order founded in 1198, in the time of Innocent III., for the purpose of ransoming Christians from the Moors.

Trinity, Religious Fraternity of the Holy. Instituted at Rome by St. Philip Neri in 1548.

Tripitaka. Tri, three, and Pitaka, basket. The canonical book of the Buddhists, written two hundred years after the third Ecumenical Council, or about 60 B. C. The former Asiatic Indra doctrines having become intolerable, Sakya, a reformer in religion, rejected the god Brahma, and the holy books of the Veda, the sacrifices and other rites, and said: "My law is grace for all." These sacred writings of the Hindus were called the Three Baskets: the basket of Laws, the basket of Discipline, and the basket of Doctrines. The first basket is called "Dharma," and relates to the law for man; the second, "Vinaya," and relates to the discipline of the priests; and the third, "Abhidharma," and pertains to the gods. It is estimated that 350,000,000 of people believe in these writings as sacred and canonical.

True Light. Sit lux et lux fuit. The translation from the Hebrew Bible of this passage, so often quoted in Masonry, is: "And the Lord said, 'Let there be light, and it was light.' And the Lord took care of the light, that it was useful; and He divided the light from the darkness."

Truro Cathedral. A Protestant edifice erected at a seaport of Cornwall, Eng., standing at the junction of two rivers, the Allen and the Kenwyn. On the 20th May, 1880, the Grand Master of Masons (Prince of Wales) laid two corner-stones of the cathedral with great pageantry, pomp, and ceremony. This was the first time a Grand Master of Masons in England was known to lay the corner-stone of an ecclesiastical structure; this was, also, the first occasion on which the present Grand Master had performed such a service, in Masonic clothing, surrounded with his staff and officers, in rich robes and in the costume of Masonry.

Truth. תָּמָר, Thm, or תְּמָה, Thme, integritas, Justice and Truth. This was the name of the Egyptian goddess. This one of the three great Masonic principles is represented among the Egyptians by an ostrich feather; and the judicial officer was also thus represented, "because that bird, unlike others, has all its feathers equal." Horapollo. The Hebrew word יוֹן, ion, signifies an ostrich, as also a council; and the word רִנָּה, Rnne, is interpreted, poetically, an ostrich, and also a song of joy, or of praise; hence, "the happy souls thus ornamented, under the inspection of the lords of the heart's joy, gathered fruits from celestial trees." In the judgment in Amenti, the soul advances toward the goddess Thme, who wears on her head the ostrich feather. In the scale, Anubis and Horus weigh the actions of the deceased. On one side is the ostrich feather, and on the other the vase containing the heart. (See next page.) Should the weight of the heart be greater than the feather, the soul is entitled to be received into the celestial courts. The forty-two judges, with heads ornamented with ostrich feathers, sit aloft to pronounce judgment. See Book of the Dead.

Tryonists. Those Pythagoreans who abstained from animal food.

TRIAL IN AMENTI.

Tsaphiel. צפאל. Mirans Deus, the angel governing the Moon, in accordance with the Kabbalistical system.

Tsedakah. צדקה, Justice. The first step of the mystical ladder, known to the Kadosh, Thirtieth degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Tsidoni. צידני, Venator. A Seeker or Inquirer. A name used in the Twenty-second degree of the A. A. Scottish Rite.

Tsoim. צעים. A term used infrequently to designate visitors.

Tub Baani Amal Abal. Heb. טוב בעני עמל אבל. It is just to reward labor. An expression found in the Thirteenth degree A. A. Scottish Rite.

Turanian. One of the three historical divisions of religion,—the other two being the Aryan and the Semitic,—and embraces the two sacred codes of China, viz., those of Confucius and Lao-tse.

U.

U. The twenty-first letter of the English alphabet, is a modification of the Greek letter Υ, upsilon; it is in the Hebrew ו, or in the Chaldaic and hieroglyphical, the head of an animal with horns, hence its symbolism. U has a close affinity to V, hence they were formerly interchanged in writing and printing.

Unhele. To uncover, or reveal. Spenser, in the Faery Queen, says, "Then suddenly both would themselves unhele."

United Friars, Fraternity of. A society established in 1785, for the "cultivation of a liberal and rational system of good fellowship." The place of meeting was known as the College of St. Luke. The society was a charitable one, giving liberally to the poor. There were a number of Colleges, the "London College languished, and finally died a natural death about 1825." Mackenzie gives the particulars of this Fraternity.

Universal Aurora, Society of the. Founded at Paris, in 1783, for the practice of mesmerism; Cagliostro, "the Divine Charlatan," taking an active part in its establishment. Very little at this day is known of it.

Universalists, Order of. A society of a Masonic bearing, founded by Retif de la Bretonne, in Paris, about 1841, and having but one degree.

"Unpublished Records of the Craft." A work thus entitled, edited by Brother Hughan, was lately published, containing many MSS. of value, theretofore unknown to the general Masonic public. Many others have since been traced, and the work of Masonic progress has a large field in the near future which will be productive of great historic good.

Upadevas. Minor works regarded as appendices to the four Canonical Vedas, and comprising the Ayurveda, on medicine, the Dhanurveda, on archery, the Gāndharvaveda, on music, and the Silpasāstra, or Arthasastras, on mechanics and other practical subjects. These were looked upon as inspired works and so classed.

Upanishad. ("Mystic.") A name given to certain Sanskrit works, of which about 150 are known, founded upon the Brahmana portion of the Vedas, and containing the "mysterious doctrine" of the process of creation, the nature of a Supreme Being, and its relation to the human soul. The older Upanishads are placed among the Sruti, or writings supposed to be inspired. See Sruti.

"Upright Man and Mason,"—and given it strictly in charge ever to walk and act as such before God and Man." Admonition in the Apprentice Degree. The definition of Man is interwoven with the triangle or pyramid, hence true and upright. In S. P. Andrew's Radical Etymology, or the origin of Language and Languages, we find the following: "Throughout the Indo-European family of languages, the syllable ma (changeable to me, mi, mo, mu) means 'great,' and na (changeable to ne, ni, no, nu) means 'small,' as their primal sense. Hence mana, mena, menu, etc., mean 'great-small,' and thence 'ratio,' or 'proportion,' allied with tapering, the cone, pyramid, or triangle. The Latin men-sa is 'a surveyor's triangular measuring-board;' me(n)ta, 'anything conical;'

mon-s, 'a mountain;' men-s, 'the mind,' i. e., 'ratio;' Sanskrit, mā; Latin, men-sum; Eng., measure; hence, Sansk., mana, manu, to think." Also see Man.

Ur. (Hebrew, אֵשׁ, fire.) Fire, light, or spirit.

Usages. The peculiarity of constant intercourse between the kings of Israel and Tyre pending the construction of the Holy House, has been frequently commented upon. That this was so is evident from the old sacred Scriptures, as well as from cumulative history by Josephus and others. This ancient custom of intercommunication would not be so marked, had these two kings ever met, yet during the years of construction, gifts and messages seem to have led to the more intimate custom of propounding problems and difficult questions. Hence the inducement to speculate upon whether there was any secret tie between these two kings or merely friendship and business. The customs, habits, and usages of the ancients are visible in every form and ceremony of Masonic work, as well as in the instruction, except where modern innovators have injured, while endeavoring to improve, the time-worn yet mellowed services of the Brotherhood. One of the most beautiful expressions occurring in the Catechism of Freemasonry is the answer to an interrogatory as to the position of the hand in assuming the vow of the First Degree; to wit, "In accordance with ancient usages the right hand has always been deemed the seat of Fidelity." A somewhat similar expression occurs in relation to the casting off of the shoe; answer, "This was in accordance with the usages of the ancient Israelites; a man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbor; this was testimony in Israel." The shoe was the symbol of subjection when sent by rulers to princes. (4th Book Ruth, 7th v.) It was the symbol of humiliation and surrender with Germans and Israelites. The formal divestiture was surrender of title.

V.

V. (Heb. ו, vau) The twenty-second letter in the English alphabet; of the Hebrew, numerical value of six. Its definition a nail, which in form it represents, and as a divine name connected with it is וְיִוְזֶה, Vezio, cum splendore; the V and O in Hebrew being equal. As a Roman numeral its value is five.

Vagao, or Bagaos. Found in the Fourth Degree of the French Rite of Adoption.

Valhalla. The North German or Scandinavian hall of the gods.

Van Rensselaer, Killian Henry. Born 1799, died January 28, 1881. A native of Albany, N. Y. State, and descendant of the well-known old Knickerbocker family, whose name he bore. He had held various positions in Craft Masonry, but in 1824 he became prominent in the A. A. Scottish Rite, to which he devoted himself for the remainder of his life, becoming an Inspector General on June 17, 1845. Bro. Van Rensselaer commanded the Supreme Council that rebelled against the ruling of Edward A. Raymond, and thus was formed another Supreme Body in the Northern States, whose difficulties were finally overcome, as were all schisms of every nature of the Scottish Rite, on the 17th of May, 1867. "Bro. Van," as he was familiarly termed, resided during the last thirty years of his life in the West, and died in California, an outlying suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio. One more sincerely devoted to the cause of Masonry, and without a day of relenting earnestness, will not in time be found.

V. D. S. A. (Veut Dieu Saint Amour.) Four words supposed to be repeated by the fraters of the Temple during certain pauses in the ceremonies. While P. D. E. P. refers to the motto "Pro Deo et Patria."

Veadar. (אָדָר.) That is, the second Adar. A month intercalated by the Jews every few years between Adar and Nisan, so as to reconcile the computation by solar and lunar time. It commences sometimes in February and sometimes in March.

Vedanga. ("Limb of the Veda.") A collection of Sanskrit works on the grammar, lexicography, chronology, and ritual of the Vedic text. They are older than the Upanishads, and are placed among the Great Shasters, though not among the Sruti.

Vessels of Gold and Silver, for the service of the First Temple, were almost numberless, according to Josephus; thus:

	Gold.	Silver.
Vessels of gold	20,000	40,000
Candlesticks	4,000	8,000
Wine cups	80,000
Goblets	10,000	20,000
Measures	20,000	40,000
Dishes	80,000	160,000
Censers	20,000	50,000
	234,000	318,000
Vestments for the priests		21,000
Musical instruments		600,000
Stoles of silver for the Levites		200,000

The storage alone for so great a supply of articles for Temple service would require much space. The vessels and vestments were always protected by a hierophylax or guardian.

Veterans. Associations of Masons "who, as such, have borne the burden and heat of the day" for at least 21 years' active service—in the State of Connecticut, 30 years. A number of these societies exist in the U. States, their objects being largely of a social nature, to set an example to the younger Masons, and to keep a watchful eye on the comfort of those whose years are becoming numbered. The assemblies are stated or casual, but in all cases annual for a Table Lodge. These associations perpetuate friendship, cultivate the social virtues, and collate and preserve the history and biography of their members.

Viceroy Eusebius. The name of the second officer in the Conclave of the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine.

"Virtute et Silentio" and "Gloria in Excelsis Deo," are significant mottoes of the Royal Order of Scotland.

Vishnu. See Puranas.

Vitra. The representative deity of darkness in Vedic mythology, and the antagonist of Indra, as the personified light. Vitra also represents ignorance, superstition, fanaticism, and intolerance, the opponents of Masonry.

Voishnuvus. Those who worship Vishnu, in white garments, and abstain from animal food. Believers in the third member of the Trimurti according to Hindu mythology, in him who was believed to be the preserver of the world, and who had undergone ten Avatars or incarnations, to wit, a bird, tortoise, wild boar, andro-lion, etc., of which the deity Krishna was the eighth incarnation in this line of Vishna, and in which form he was supposed to be the son of Devanaguy and reared by the shepherd Nanda.

Voltaire. (François-Marie Arouet.) One of the most famous of French writers, born at Châtenay, near Sceaux in 1694. His early life was loose and varied. In 1728 he became infatuated with a Madame du Chatelet. His literary works cover some 90 volumes. In 1743, government dispatched him on a mission to Frederick the Great, by whom he was held in high favor, and in 1750, at the request of the king, he made his residence in Berlin, but five years later they quarrelled, and Voltaire moved to Ferney, Switzerland. His literary talent was most varied, and in invective he had no equal. During his exile in England he imbibed Deistical theories, which marked his life. He was charged with atheism. He was initiated in the Lodge of the Nine Sisters, at Paris, February 7, 1778, in the presence of Franklin and others distinguished in Masonry. Died May 30, 1778, which gave rise to a memorable Lodge of Sorrow held on the succeeding 28th of November.

W.

W. The twenty-third letter of the English alphabet, which originated in the Middle Ages, is a double v, and is peculiar to the English, German, and Dutch alphabets.

Wahabites. A Mohammedan sect, established about 1740, dominant through the greater part of Arabia. Their doctrine was reformatory, to bring back the observances of Islam to the literal precepts of the Koran. Mecca and Medina were conquered by them. The founder was Ibn-abd-ul-Wahab, son of an Arab sheik, born in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and died 1787. Their teachings have been received by the Mussulman population of India, and much uneasiness is feared therefrom.

Wallachia, Grand Scottish Degree of. Found in Fustier's lists.

Wellington, Duke of. The "Hero of Waterloo," and the renowned, was initiated in Lodge No. 494, about December, 1790.

"Westminster and Keystone." The third of the three oldest warranted Lodges in England, having been chartered in 1721. The first is Friendship, No. 6, and the second the British, No. 8. Those assembling without warrants are only two, and are numbered two and four, "Antiquity" and "Somerset House."

Wheat. An emblem of plenty under the name of "Corn," which see in the body of this work.

Widow, Sons of the. A society founded in the third century, by a Persian slave, Manes, who had been purchased and adopted by a widow. It consisted of two degrees, Auditor and Elut.

William, Emperor of Germany. An honorary member of the Grand Lodge of Scotland and protector of Freemasonry in Germany, his son, the crown prince, being deputy-protector.

Wolfgang, Albert, Prince of Lippe Schaumburg. Born in 1699, died in 1748. One of the Masonic circle whom Frederick the Great favored and sought at times to meet.

Woodford Manuscript. A manuscript in the possession of one of England's most esteemed Masons, Rev. A. F. A. Woodford, editor of Kenning's Cyclopædia of Freemasonry, of 700 pages, London. Bro. Hughan says it is almost a verbatim copy of the Cooke MSS. The indorsement upon it reads, "This is a very ancient record of Masonry, which was copied for me by William Reid, Secretary to the Grand Lodge, 1728," etc. It formerly belonged to Mr. William Cowper, clerk to the Parliament, and subsequently to the historian, Sir J. Palgrave.

Wound, Mason's. Nicolai, in the appendix to his Essay on the Accusations against the Templars, says that in a small dictionary, published at the beginning of the eighteenth century, the following definition is to be found, "Mason's Wound. It is an imaginary wound above the elbow, to represent a fracture of the arm occasioned by a fall from an elevated place." The origin and esoteric meaning of the phrase have been lost. It was probably used as a test, or alluded to some legend which has now escaped memory. Also, the Master's penalty in the degree of Perfection.

X.

X. The twenty-fourth letter of the English alphabet and the last letter of the proper Latin alphabet. As a numeral it stands for ten.

Xystus. In ancient architecture a long and open, but sometimes covered, court with porticoes, for athletic exercises.

Xysuthrus. The name of the Babylonish king at the time of the Deluge. According to Berossus, ninth of a race who reigned 432,000 years. Also, Adrahasis of Surippak, son of Ubara-Tutu, the patriarch, to whom, according to the Deluge Tablet, the gods revealed the secret of the impending deluge, and who erected an ark accordingly, whereby he and his family and seven of all clean beasts were saved. Xysuthrus means "shut up in a box or ark," from the two characters signifying "enclosed," and "box," respectively. In Accadian he is called Tamzi (Tammuz), "The sun of life."

Y.

Y. The twenty-fifth letter of the English alphabet, and is derived from the Greek Υ. It came into use by Roman writers in the time of Cicero, in spelling words borrowed from the Greek.

Yaksha. The name of a class of demigods in Hindu mythology, whose care is to attend on Kuvera, the god of riches, and see to his garden and treasures.

Yalla. A word said to have been used by the Templars in the adoration of the Baphometus, and derived from the Saracens.

Yama. (Sankr. Yama, a twin.) According to the Hindu mythology, the judge and ruler of the departed; the Hindu Pluto, or king of the infernal regions; originally conceived of as one of the first pair from whom the human race is descended, and the beneficent sovereign of his descendants in the abodes of the blest; later, a terrible deity, the tormentor of the wicked. He is represented of a green color, with red garments, having a crown on his head, his eyes inflamed, and sitting on a buffalo, with a club in his hand.

Yellow Caps, Society of. The name of a society said to have been founded by Ling-Ti, in China, in the eleventh century.

Yezdegerdian. Pertaining to the era of Yezdegerd, the last Sassanian monarch of Persia, who was overthrown by the Mohammedans. The era is still used by the Parsees, and began 16th of June, 632, A. D.

Yezidee. One of a sect bordering on the Euphrates, whose religious worship mixes up the Devil with some of the doctrines of the Magi, Mohammedans, and Christians.

Yggdrasil. The name given in Scandinavian mythology to the greatest and most sacred of all trees, which was conceived as binding together heaven, earth, and hell. It is an ash, whose branches spread over all the world, and reach above the heavens. It sends out three roots in as many different directions; one to the Asa-gods in heaven, another to the Frost-giants, the third to the under-world. Under each root springs a wonderful fountain, endowed with marvellous virtues. From the tree itself springs a honey-dew. The serpent, Nithhöggr, lies at the under-world fountain and gnaws the root of Yggdrasil; the squirrel, Ratatöskr, runs up and down, and tries to breed strife between the serpent and the eagle, which sits aloft.

York, Edward Augustus, Duke of. Initiated a Mason in 1766.

York, Frederick, Duke of. Initiated a Mason in "Britannia Lodge," London, November 21, 1787. A commemorative Masonic token was issued in 1795; the Duke of York having been installed W. M. of the "Prince of Wales Lodge," March 22, 1793.

York Grand Lodge. Brother Woodford says this is a short title for "The Grand Lodge of all England," held at York, which was formed from an old Lodge, in 1725, at work evidently during the seventeenth century, and probably much earlier. The annual assembly was held in the city of York by the Masons for centuries, and is so acknowledged virtually by all the MSS. from the fourteenth century. A list of Master Masons of the York Minster, during its erection, is preserved, of the fourteenth century; and legend and actual history agree in the fact that York was the home of the Mason-craft until modern times—the "Charter of Prince Edwin" being one of the earliest traditions. The Grand Lodge preserved its position in the north of England until 1792, when it finally died out, it having constituted other Lodges, and a "Grand Lodge, south of the Trent" (at London). All of the "York" Lodges succumbed on the decease of their "Mother Grand Lodge." There has not been a representative of the Ancient York Grand Lodge anywhere whatever throughout this century.

Yug, or Yuga. One of the ages, according to Hindu mythology, into which the Hindus divide the duration or existence of the world.

Z.

Z. (Heb., ז, Zain.) Twenty-sixth and last letter of the English alphabet. In Hebrew the numerical value is seven. This letter was added to the Latin from the Greek in the time of Cicero. The Greek letter is zeta, ζ.

Zachai. (Heb., זכאי.) A name applied to the Deity.

Zadki-el. The name of one of the angels of the seven planets, according to the Jewish rabbins;—the angel of the planet Jupiter.

Zaphnath-paaneah. An Egyptian title given to the patriarch Joseph by the Egyptian king under whom he was viceroy. The name has been interpreted "Revealer of secrets," and is a password in the old rituals of the Scottish Rite.

Zarriel. The angel that, in accordance with the Kabbalistical system, governs the sun.

Zarvan-akar-ana. ("Time without limits.") According to the Parsees, the name of a deity or abstract principle which existed even before the birth of Ahriman and Ormuz.

Zebulon. Son of Jacob and Leah; in the exodus his tribe marched next to Judah and Issachar, and received the territory bounded on the east by the south half of the Lake of Galilee, including Rimmon, Nazareth, and the plain of Buttauf, where stood Cana of Galilee. Heb. זְבוּלֹן, Heaven, or the abode of God. See Jabu'na.

Zechariah. "The son of Iddo," born in Babylonia during the captivity, who joined Zerubbabel on his return to Palestine. A leader and a man of influence, being both priest and prophet.

Zelator. The first degree in the First Order of the Rosicrucian Society.

Zenzem. The holy well in Mecca.

Zenana. The inner portion of a gentleman's house in India, devoted to the use of females. In contrast with the front or gentleman's portion, it is devoid of comforts. Each woman has a small cell, on second or third story, fronting on the inner court of the square structure.

Zend Avesta. ("Commentary and text.") The Bible of the ancient Persians and of the modern Parsees or Guebers, who number about 7000 in Persia and 200,000 in India. It is ascribed to Zoroaster (see Zend Avesta, MACKEY), who is said to have written 2,000,000 verses, covering 12,000 cowskin parchments. In its present fragmentary state it consists of the Vendidad, of 22 chapters, being the one surviving part (the 20th) of an original work of 21 parts; the Yasna, of 72 chapters; the Visparad, of 23 chapters; 24 sections called Yashts, and a few fragments.

Zeraias. One of the three officers appointed by king Solomon to superintend the hewing of the timbers in the forests of Lebanon.

Zetland, Thomas Dundas, Earl of. One of the most noted of the noblemen of England, born in 1795, and initiated in the "Prince of Wales Lodge,

No. 259." Appointed S. G. Warden in 1832, Deputy in 1839, Pro. G. M. in 1840. Upon the decease of the Duke of Sussex, in 1843, the Earl became the chief ruler of the craft, until March, 1844, when he was elected M. W. G. M. He was Prov. G. Master of North and East Yorkshire from 1835 until he died, in 1873.

Zeus. Greatest of the national deities of Greece, son of Chronos and Rhea, brother of Poseidon and Hera, and husband of the latter. Mostly worshipped in Crete, Arcadia, and Dodona. Finally the great Hellenic divinity, identified with Jupiter of the Romans and Amon of the Libyans. Zeus was represented as of majestic form, holding in one hand a sceptre, and in the other a thunderbolt, signified by the above symbol.

Zi. In the Izdubar legends, a kind of spiritual essence residing in every organic thing, each created object having its special Zi, of which the Supreme Being was a more exalted genus. Zi was also by a parity of reasoning regarded as the soul of man, and even man himself.

Zicu or Ziggara. The Accadian name for primeval matter.

Zif. (Iyar) זִיף. The eighth month of the civil and the second of the sacred year of the Hebrews, commencing on the first of the new moon in the month of April. The name of this month is mentioned but once in the Scriptures, and then as relating to the date of the commencement of Solomon's Temple. The month Bul, or Marchesvan, is mentioned as the date of the completion of the Temple.

Zillah. Wife of Lamech, mother of Tubal Cain and Naamah. One of the few females mentioned as of the antediluvian period.

Zinzendorf, Count von, Nicolaus Ludwig. Founder of the existing sect of Moravian brethren; also of a religious society which he called the "Order of the Grain of Mustard-Seed." He was ordained bishop of the Moravians in 1737, at request of King Frederick William I. of Prussia, went to London, and was received by Wesley. In 1741 proceeded to Bethlehem, in America, and founded the Moravian settlements. A prolific author of a hundred volumes. Born at Dresden 1700, died 1760.

Zithern. An instrument of music of 28 strings drawn over a shallow box; both hands are employed in playing on it.

Zoan. An Egyptian town, known to the Greeks as Tanais, presumed to have been founded 3700 B. C., and probably the residence of the Pharaohs of the Exodus.

Zodiac. Many of the Egyptian temples contain astronomical representations; notably those of Esneh, Contra Latopolis, and Denderah, were famous for their zodiacal ceilings. Antiquity was accorded to the records of the Egyptian empire by calculations made from the positions of the stars on the monuments and on these ceilings. Closer criticism now reveals these positions to be fanciful and the data unreliable. The zodiac of Denderah has been removed to Paris, where it forms the chief ornament of the museum of the Louvre. Those remaining in Egypt are suffering from deterioration. Crosses will be found to be a portion of five of the signs of the zodiac.

Zohar. (Heb. זֹהָר, splendor.) After the surrender of Jerusalem, through the victory of Vespasian, among the fugitives was Rabbi Simon Ben Jochai, who remained an Anchorite for twelve years, became visionary, and believed he was visited by the prophet Elias. His son, Rabbi Eliezer, and his clerk, Rabbi Abba, when visiting himself, took down his pronounced divine precepts, which were in time gathered and formed into the famous Sohar or Zohar. From this work, the Sepher Jetzirah, and the Commentary of the Ten Sephiroth was formed the Kabbala. The Zohar, its history, and as well that of its author, overflow with beautiful yet ideal mysticism.

Zohariti. ("The Illuminated.") A society founded by Jacob Franck at the beginning of the last century.

Zonar. The symbolic girdle of the Christians and Jews worn in the Levant, as a mark of distinction, that they may be known from the Mohammedans.

Zschokke, J. H. D. One of the most eminent Masons and German authors known to this century. Born at Magdeburg, 1771, died 1848.

Zuni Indians. A tribe inhabiting New Mexico, U. S., whose mystic services have attracted the attention of Masonic scholars in consequence of their similarity to those in vogue by the Masonic fraternity. These Indians have a formal religious initiation, in which the suppliant kneels at the altar to take his vows, after being received upon the point of an instrument of torture to the flesh. Among their forms and ceremonies are facing the east, circumambulation, tests of endurance, and being peculiarly clothed. Incense is burned, and the sun worshipped at its rising.
